"I can with all confidence say, when the face is got up with these things, it will have a beautiful and natural appearance, not to be detected by the closest observer. Neither will any of these things have the slightest injurious effect in any way (?). Knowing these are delicate matters to ask for, particularly belladonna, I shall be most happy to oblige you with them, which, if they are not decidedly refused, are often supplied so poor that they do not produce the desired effect. Gentlemen sometimes have a fancy for darkening the eyebrows and eyelashes, which on almost every face has a very pretty effect, being the means of setting off the complexion to great advantage. For these purposes I have nice preparations, very easy to use, which will not stain the skin."

Excellent woman! Not content with improving the complexion of her own sex, she is also willing to aid in making the other still more irresistible. To this end she will furnish all manner of dyes, hair-restorers, corn-plasters, swan's-down, and China rose-leaf powder, with particular attention paid to the packing, "so as to be safe and free from observation." If any thing could take away the vulgarity of paint and powder, it would be a free and unembarrassed use of them, even to the frankness with which Spanish girls display their cascarilla and carmine. It is with slightly contemptuous glance we ladies see a flushed belle enter the dressing-room after a dance at a public ball, and seizing an instant when she fancies every body is looking the other way, snatch the swan's-down puff from the bosom of her bodice where she carries it, and give furtive passes over her cheeks, turning away with a vain effort for unconsciousness that makes the flush warmer than it ought to be. Better that a lady should walk calmly up to the great glass and renew her complexion with cool care, secure in her right to be so foolish if she pleases, and the knowledge that every body else about her does the same. It is better not to powder and paint, but if these things are used, let them be artistically applied, and their presence neither obtruded nor denied.

The oatmeal wash for softening the face, the cold bath and open-air walk to brighten the eye, with coarse food and fruits to refine the complexion, are the best cosmetics in the world. By their means a face is made up to be as lovely at eight in the morning as at eleven at night, and as bewitching at fourscore as at nineteen. They were the secrets of the oldest beauties, whose exploits were famous when they were old enough to be grandmothers and great-grandmothers. If a lady has lost color and sparkle through fatigue or ill health, there are ways of simulating charms without recourse to poisons. But these ways and means will form the burden of another chapter.

Hosted by Google

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THERE is still no change of importance in the fashions, though every style is worn according to taste—polonaises, double skirts, short dresses, demi-trains, full trains, vests, basque-waists (single and double breasted), pointed waists for evening, and round waists with buckled belts; paletots, vest-polonaises, long casaques, talmas, and mantelets; in short, there is but one thing that is not seen, namely, shawls, and consequently it may be safely predicted that at the first radical change that takes place in the fashions, shawls will be resumed with eagerness. At present they are tolerated rather than adopted; they are thrown on as a protection against the changes of atmosphere, which the wearer apologizes for, and is anxious to abandon at the first opportunity. Young girls and youthful married ladies will wear plaid shawls this winter for négligé toilettes, folded through the middle, and passed scarf-wise across the shoulders, the ends being crossed in front, or carried again to the back, and fastened with a shawl-pin. This arrangement will be convenient in some cases, especially when there is no wrapping like the polonaise or over-skirt that is worn over a velveteen skirt.

Velvet will be pre-eminently the fashionable material of the winter. It is manufactured in an inconceivable variety of styles. I have recently seen samples of pieces selected by Worth for winter toilettes. Besides silk velvets and velveteens, plain, but of the most singular shades, there were figured, printed, and stamped velvets, and still other kinds. Some of these samples had a ground of black faille with damask designs (large running figures) of black raised velvet. Others were of olive bronze velvet, with very fine, close stripes, alternately velvet and lustreless silk. Still others were of stamped velvet, with a dark blue mottled ground, covered with a damask pattern formed of pale pink flowers and olive green foliage.

Embroidery on wool and silk continues to be much worn; in the first case (on wool) the embroidery is always of silk; in the second (on silk), it is often of wool. This combination is very effective. I should add, however, that this kind of embroidery is always ephemeral, and for this reason, as well as on account of their high price, embroidered costumes remain somewhat exclusive, and are only adopted by those who are very rich, or who do not care to wear the same dresses long. The embroidery most in vogue at this moment is wreaths of flowers embroidered in their natural colors—roses, daisies, or fuchsias. It is very expensive, and, to my taste, very ugly. A prettier and more stylish kind is embroidery of the same or a lighter shade than the dress.

Elegant toilettes are composed of silk and cashmere, the former being used for the skirt, and the latter for the over-skirt or polonaise. For still more costly dresses silk and poplin are used, the latter taking the place of the cashmere.

I saw a charming costume lately made of two old dresses, one of black alpaca, and the other of black faille, with a little light blue cashmere. The alpaca dress was converted into a skirt, and entirely hidden by alternate bias folds of black faille and blue cashmere. Basque-waist of black faille, simply trimmed with a blue cashmere fold. A blue cashmere scarf encircled the waist, and was tied first under the right arm and then a little lower down in simple knots without loops or ends. This combination can be varied infinitely by substituting muslin de laine for the cashmere, which is somewhat heavy. Violet is chosen for half mourning or for elderly persons, and pink for evening dresses, and for young girls or children; or two shades may be used. I have mentioned this dress because it is one of the few that ally real elegance to economy.

Small fichus of light-colored crêpe de Chine, trimmed with crimped fringe, are much worn with square-necked or heart-shaped dresses. Lamballe scarfs are also made of the same crêpe de Chine, likewise trimmed with crimped fringe, to be worn over high dresses. The favorite trimming for the necks of dresses is a ruche of white silk tulle, laid in narrow pleats, and set on narrow open-work insertion, set inside the dress. A narrow black ribbon run through the ruche serves to tighten or loosen it at pleasure. On the dress itself is sewed a ruche of silk or crêpe de Chine of the same color as the material, or else a contrasting shade, and edged with white lace. The ends of the trimming are concealed under a bow of white lace and colored ribbon or crêpe de Chine. The under-sleeves are composed of a very deep box-pleated flounce of white silk tulle, edged with insertion and lace.

I can not yet speak at length of ball dresses; nevertheless I have just had the good fortune to see a trousseau prepared for a château where a wedding is to be celebrated next month. On this occasion a compromise will be made between ancient and modern usages, and a large ball will be given on the night before the marriage. The bride's last toilette as a young girl, which is singularly handsome, consists of a very long skirt of pale pink silk, trimmed with a deep flounce on the edge of the tablier, and three flounces on the other breadths. All the flounces are of white silk gauzy grenadine, surmounted with a roll of velvet of a deeper shade of pink than the skirt. Over-skirt of the same white silk grenadine, formed entirely of lengthwise puffs, with rolls of pink velvet between the puffs, on which are set small bows of the same velvet, without ends, at intervals. The three back breadths are terminated by several long loops and ends of pink velvet. Low-necked waist, edged with a Medicis collarette of white tulle; these collarettes are composed of large pleats, which are held upright by means of fine iron wires. Very short puffed sleeves, with long over-sleeves, known as wings, set on the waist just behind the arms, toward the back. Wreath of white clematis in the hair. The waist is pointed sharp in front, and somewhat rounded behind.

The bridal dress is of regal simplicity. I use the word advisedly, for at present simplicity is found only among the highest ranks. The Faubourg St. Germain, the aristocratic quarter of Paris, dresses infinitely more simply than the Faubourg St. Honoré, the quarter of the newly enriched. The dress in question is of white faille, with very wide stripes of épinglé velvet, and without trimming of any kind. The skirt is extremely long. The moyen-âge corsage is high and plain, and extends over the hips. Under the waist is fastened an aumônière of white velvet with a gilt clasp.

For coiffures and trimmings of dresses and bonnets new effects are still procured by the combination of different colors and shades. A multitude of reversible ribbons are manufactured for the coming winter, with one side black, and the other blue, pink, or violet; or else of velvet on one side and satin on the other; or of pale olive or any other color on one side, and the other of a darker shade. These ribbons are worn sometimes with one surface outside and sometimes the other, at pleasure. Bonnets, which unhappily are still very high, will be almost always lined with a different color from the outside, and will be trimmed almost exclusively with feathers or ribbon, and not with winter flowers. Some of these long curled feathers fall backward like the horse's tail on a French cuirassier's helmet.

Numerous felt bonnets are in preparation which are designed for demi-négligé toilettes. Velvet or felt will be the alternative for the winter bonnets; no others are made, and it will be necessary to choose one or the other, unless one takes both.

As regards woolen fabrics, what will be worn most this winter is diagonal vigogne—that is, with a fine and almost invisible bias thread.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

BY F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER XIV.

SIGNOR VIZZOBINI.

THE Saxe-Gotha Gardens were not doing well. Even the re-engagement of Signor Vizzobini had not aroused the locality to enthusiasm. The people had grown tired of the Saxe-Gotha, and even the orders were slow in coming in; the dancing license had been suspended that season also, and the patrons and patronesses of the gardens found it dreary work promenading round the refreshment shed, and the stone boy with the everlasting squirt.

It was a terribly dull evening, even for the Saxe-Gotha, Reuben Culwick discovered, when he had entered for the second time on what the programme informed him was a fairy tableau of surpassing brilliancy and splendor; seen under the aspect of a damp and drizzling night, the brilliancy was impaired and the splendor was nowhere. The orders, that had been most freely circulated in the neighborhood, in the hope that free admissions would drink a little when they did come, had not responded gratefully to the invitation; and there was but a sparse representation of humanity, which huddled itself under the broad eaves of the shed, and stared dismally at the wet trees opposite. The lamps had not been all lighted, after the proprietor had discovered that the receipts at the doors would not cover the consumption of oil and candles; but the band, that was paid by the week, was permitted to play on along with the fountain, which, as the collector of water-rates had threatened to cut off the supply in a day or two, was going it most vigorously.

It was a more respectable evening than ordinary, owing to the scanty attendance. The immense army of the disreputables haunting the shady corners of South London was shy of the open air when rain was falling—uncleanness and squalor hated getting wet, and found a difficulty in getting dry again, with no change of clothes to speak of; hence a few specimens of honest indigence, yearning for any contrast to close alleys and fetid rooms, had found their way to Hope Street. It had been announced as a juvenile night also, with the fire-works at an early hour; and a few intrepid mothers had brought babies in arms and young children to the spectacle, and were indignant at the announcement, written in text-hand, and affixed with red wafers to the trunk of a tree, that "in consequence of the inclemency of the weather, the pyrotechnic display by Mr. Jennings is postponed till the next gala night." Still there was music in the orchestra, and Signor Vizzobini would appear in due course; and what there was of audience—Mr. Splud, lessee, counted fifty-two with the babies in arms—kept to the shelter of the lilac bushes or the refreshment shed, or dragged their adventurous way through the puddles lying in the paths.

Reuben Culwick stood under a shady tree, smoking. With a pipe in his mouth, an old blue Scotch cap drawn down to his eyebrows, and a water-proof coat, with its shiny collar turned up to his ears, he looked more in tone with the assemblage than he had done on the occasion of his extempore visit two nights since. He had a hope that in this guise he should not attract any notice; but although he evaded a portion of it, there were curious eyes fixed on him now and then, and one mind perplexed by his appearance.

That one mind, represented by no less a personage than the lessee himself, directed its particular attention to him about a quarter to nine o'clock. Mr. Splud had given up expecting a further influx of company by that time, and had put his head gardener—he had one gardener and a little boy to attend to the grounds during the season—at the pay-office, while he mixed in a friendly way with the company. He was a tall, lank man, with sandy hair, and a melancholy aspect: keeping gardens open under difficulties had quenched every atom of cheerfulness in him. He had two bead-like eyes, which he had a habit of rolling into their corners and looking out of them sidewise at the object which he desired to inspect, that gave him a somewhat sly appearance also; and this was remarkable as he took his stand under the tree where Reuben was, and smoked and expectorated as vehemently as if he had a match against time on.

"This is a bad night for our business, Sir," he said at last.

Reuben had anticipated that the proprietor would burst into conversation, and was disposed to encourage it.

"So I should think," answered Reuben.

"Rain always keeps the people away: no matter what you offer them in the way of attraction, they won't come, Sir."

"No—they evidently won't come," echoed Reuben.

"You must not take this evening, or the last evening on which you favored us," said the proprietor, startling Reuben a little by the remark, "as a sample of the general style of patronage we get."

"No?" said Reuben, interrogatively.

"I have known fifty thousand people here."

"That's a very fair number, I should say," Reuben remarked, dryly.

"Yes, pretty fair; but we ought to have them. It's a nice, cool place."

Reuben was shivering to the marrow, and instantly agreed with him.

"And where are the people to go, if they don't come here?" asked Mr. Splud.

Reuben could not imagine. He had never thought of that.

"People in this part of London, I mean," he added, more modestly, "although we have hundreds of West End swells, who come to look about them, like yourself, Sir."

Here the eyes remained so long in the corners nearest to Reuben that Reuben was afraid that Mr. Splud's vision had become permanently fixed.

"Unless you are looking for any body in particular—as may be the case, you know—and perhaps I can help you," suggested Mr. Splud.

"Thank you," said Reuben.

There was a long pause, and then the proprietor said, slowly,

"In the police, I think?"

"No—not in the police."

"You haven't come from Blater's, I suppose?"

No—Reuben had not come from Blater's, though who Blater was he was never curious enough to inquire. Probably some one who had lent Mr. Splud money or goods, for a sigh of relief struggled from the lessee's narrow chest.

"Because I have seen you somewhere, and that is what bothers me a bit," said Mr. Splud, by way of explanation and apology for his numerous questions.

Reuben did not tell him that he was lodging next door but one, and that they had passed each other in the street with tolerable frequency; but the idea had suggested itself to put a few questions on his own account, and even to throw an air of mystery, even a detective policeman's air of mystery, over his inquiries, when a third person, smoking a short pipe, joined them. The new-comer was a small spare man, in a long seedy great-coat, with big horn buttons, extending from his chin to his heels, and who wore a dirty yellow handkerchief tied loosely round his throat. He was a man of an unearthly pallor, and pitted so deeply with small-pox that one wondered how he had ever struggled out of the disease alive. It was an unpleasant face to regard closely, and the red ferrety eyelids, and the small sunken black eyes, did not redeem in any way the general ugliness of the new-comer. He came up with his hands and half his arms thrust in the side pockets of his coat, and talked to Mr. Splud, with his little eyes regarding Reuben Culwick from their corners in the lessee's own peculiar way.

"You don't want me to-night, I suppose?" he said to the proprietor.

"Yes, I do want you."

"What for?"

"Because I pay you," said Mr. Splud, sharply. "You don't want your money next Saturday, I suppose?" he asked, with so much biting sarcasm in the question that he showed every yellow tooth in his head—and uncommonly yellow they all were—at the gentleman whom he addressed.

"Yes, I do—and I'll take care I get it," said the other, far from civilly, "along with last week's."

"Well, I wish you may get it—but you'll have to do your work for it."

"What's the use of dressing up, and a-performing in the blessed rain"—he did not call it blessed rain, however—"before nobody. There's nobody here, there's nobody coming—and it's a beastly shame on me."

"The gardens are open—the public expects to be amused," said the lessee, grandiloquently, "and it is not the mission of Samuel Splud to break faith with the public. If there were only one child in the gardens on this unfortunate juvenile evening, and that child were fast asleep and clasped to the fond bosom of its mother, I would carry out the programme in its entirety, or perish in the attempt to do my duty to my patrons. It is the knowledge that I keep faith with the public that renders the Saxe-Gotha the most popular place of recreation on this side of the Thames."

The man marked with the small-pox opened his mouth in amazement at this long address, and turned suddenly to Reuben at its conclusion.

"You're going to take the crib off of his hands, I see—buy him out, and his good-will and fixtures and all?"

Mr. Splud appeared to be annoyed at this, and said,

"If the gentleman has any idea of that kind, he will talk to me, not you."

"I have no idea of purchase," said Reuben; "and if I have the honor of addressing Signor Vizzobini, I may add that I have come here this evening expressly to witness his performance."

"Have you, though?" said the acrobat, once more surprised, and in an extraordinary degree, by this explanation. "Good Lord!"

"You may well be astonished. I am," said Mr. Splud, solemnly again.

"Well, if you can't let a fellow off, I'll go and dress," said Vizzobini; and after another sharp glance at our hero, he walked away in deep thought.

"I think you said that you were not in the police, Sir?" said Mr. Splud, with great urbanity.

"Certainly not."

"The same idea has suggested itself to my employé, at all events, and you have rendered him extremely uncomfortable, but it serves him right. He's an ill-tempered, hateful, insolent cur, and, Heaven be praised, next Saturday sees the last of him."

"He will leave the gardens, perhaps?"

"I wish he would. It would be breach of contract, and I should not pay him a farthing."

Reuben moved toward the entrance gates, and Mr. Splud laughed for the first time—laughed so heartily that it was evident that it was only bad luck that kept his spirits at zero.

"Oh, not in the police at all—certainly not," he said, knowingly; "but you need not be afraid of losing your man. He has gone into the room under the orchestra to dress."

Reuben returned to his place beneath the tree, and Mr. Splud once more joined him.

"What's the case—murder or burglary or petty theft? They are all three in his line, I fancy."

"Do you know any thing of him?"

"Only that he is a vagabond not up to his work," said Mr. Splud. "I took him by advertisement, on the faith of his recommendations, which I firmly believe now are forgeries. He has fallen off three times this week, and if he breaks his neck one of these fine days, it will be a happy release to the profession. I sha'n't go into superfine black for him myself," he added, vindictively.

"Why did you re-engage him?"

"I didn't, Sir. It was all in the first contract—only it became necessary to puff him. Fancy a man of my attainments reduced to puffing that brute!" and here a real tear made its appearance at one of the favorite corners of his eyes, and trickled forlornly down his cheek.

"I haven't been used to this kind of thing," said Mr. Splud, by way of apology for his weakness; "I have been in a large way of theatrical business—real horses—legitimate drama—over the water, Sir."

"What is that man's real name?" asked Reuben.

"I haven't the slightest idea; Jack Sheppard, perhaps."

"You know his address, surely?"

"Oh yes. No. 2 Potter's Court, Walworth Road."

"Thank you. Good-night."

Reuben Culwick was gone. Even Signor Vizzobini observed it when he was sitting astride an uncomfortably wet rope, with the rain pouring on his fleshings and spangles, and the band wheezing out its melancholy old waltz. Signor Vizzobini looked down at the lamps and scanty audience, and at the lessee standing opposite sneering at him; but of the stranger, lured to the Saxe-Gotha by the report of his abilities, there was not a sign. Vizzobini's feelings were hurt, for he muttered, "What a liar!" before commencing his performance, which he hurried through in such indecent haste that Mr. Splud was more than ever disgusted with his contract with him.

CHAPTER XV.

FOUND.

No. 2 Potter's Court, Walworth Road, was somewhat difficult to find; but, by aid of a few inquiries from the police, Reuben Culwick discovered it among a nest of little streets half-way toward the Elephant and Castle.

Potter's Court was not a cheerful thoroughfare at that time of night, and it required a fair amount of nerve—which our hero did not lack, however—to descend three or four broken steps at the entrance, and dive into the darkness that stretched beyond them.

The gas-light at the top of the steps, down which the indiscreet traveler and the tipsy tenant of Potter's Court were continually floundering, shed but little light upon the first few yards of the way, and was of no service at the extremity of the passage, where, it was rumored, murder had been done once, with no one the wiser till the morning.

Potter's Court, Walworth Road, bore an ugly name, and its lank, dingy tenements were full of "ugly customers." There were all degrees of ugliness—the hideous and variable ugliness of crime—in Potter's Court, and but a few specimens of honest industry, or of poverty rendered respectable or heroic by its struggle to keep out of the work-house. The "dangerous classes" had the place pretty well to themselves, and were called for frequently by enterprising gentlemen with numbers on their collars; it was a thoroughfare with a brand upon it—a jungle where the wild beasts of the streets herded together, and shunned the light after the habits of their kind.

Hosted by Google

Reuben Culwick knew nothing of Potter's Court; but he muttered, "Poor Sarah!" as he went down the cavernous entry in search of No. 2.

There were several lodging-houses in the court, with "Beds, Threepence per Night," written over the front-door, although the hour was too late to read the inscriptions; but No. 2 was a private house in its way, with a family on each floor, and the door left open for the convenience of the tenants' ingress and egress, like a house in a Glasgow close.

Reuben knocked at the parlor door with the handle of his stick, and a grim-looking individual in his shirt sleeves answered the appeal, and stood with a light in his hand glaring at the intruder.

"What's up?" he said, in not too civil a style of address.

"Does a Mr. Eastbell live here?"

"Don't think he does."

"Do you know a Mr. Vizzobini?" said Reuben, suddenly recollecting himself, and thinking also that, for reasons too numerous to mention, Thomas Eastbell, late of Worcester, might have arrived in London incognito.

"Fitser—who?"

"He performs at the Saxe-Gotha Gardens on the slack rope," Reuben explained still further.

"Oh! that bloke," said the parlor floor, disparagingly; "top of the 'ouse—front-room."

"Thank you."

The man slammed the door upon our hero, and did not wait for his thanks; but as Reuben went up the dark stairs, it is worthy of remark that he came softly into the passage again, and stood there listening to the firm, regular tread of him who ascended thus fearlessly. When the footsteps were echoing up the second flight, the man put his head into the court, looked steadily along its whole length to the dingy lamp at the top of the distant steps, and then drew back into the shadow again.

"Cheek!" he muttered; "a friend, or information received?—Here, Pincher."

Pincher, a wiry little terrier that in the darkness might have passed for a rat, dashed from the room at his master's call, and, as if trained to the business—and it was highly probable that he was—darted up stairs with a rattling, scuffling noise, passed Reuben, and commenced barking vociferously when it had reached the top landing, where Reuben presently followed, with his hand clutching carefully at his stick, prepared to brain Pincher on the spot should it make a sally at his lower extremities. But the animal was content to sit on its hind-legs, and bark and howl and shriek, like a dog in a rat-trap, or under the wheel of a wagon.

Reuben reached the front-room door with his stick, and rapped gently but emphatically against the panel. The dog ceased barking when he had knocked, and went scuffling to the bottom of the stairs again, where his master picked him up by the nape of the neck, and carried him indoors.

Meanwhile Reuben, after waiting patiently for a reply to his summons, knocked again.

"Who's there?" said a faint, weak voice, which Reuben did not recognize.

"A friend."

"We've no friends here."

"I come from the Saxe-Gotha."

"From Tom?"

"Yes."

"Oh!"

The door was cautiously opened, and there streamed through the aperture, through which a woman's face was peering—white and wan and pinched—a rush of hot air as from a furnace mouth.

"Is he locked up?" said the woman, somewhat apathetically.

"No. He will be back presently, I think."

"I thought he was locked up. Do you want to come in?"

"Yes."

"Come in if you like, then—we don't charge any more," said the woman, with a sombre flippancy that sat particularly ill upon her, and which was followed by a fit of coughing that seemed more natural to the miserable appearance she presented.

The woman, who wore no boots, glided back noiselessly to the side of a big fire that was blazing inappropriately in the grate that summer night, sat down in the chair she had quitted, and leaned her head against the wall like a woman tired out.

But it was not her at which he gazed so intently as at the figure of a girl in a striped cotton dress who lay face-foremost on the patchwork counterpane of the bed, and whose face was hidden by her hands. It was a figure of despair that thrilled him; it was surely Second-cousin Sarah cowering from him in that hour of her discovery.

The woman, with her head against the wall, observed the intent gaze of Reuben in the direction of the prostrate girl.

"She's asleep; you need not mind her."

"Are you sure?"

"As sure as I'm a living woman, or a living skeleton. She's been like that for hours, the silly."

"Why silly?"

"Because she— Here, I say, what's your message?" asked the woman, putting a sudden check upon her volubility; "what have you got to say about Tom, and what has Tom to say?"

"Are you Tom's wife?"

"Yes, I am."

"And that's Tom's sister?"

"What of it?" was the rejoinder.

"From St. Oswald's Almshouses, Worcester?"

"Eh?—yes. You're pat enough with your facts. How did you get them? If you've come for her, I—I—"

Here the woman burst into a second paroxysm of coughing, for the cessation of which Reuben waited patiently, keeping his eyes upon the figure on the bed, and doubtful still if it were sleep that kept Sarah so dumb and passive. It was a violent cough, that of Mrs. Eastbell's, which was rending away all the life that was left in the sufferer, who carried consumption in her every look and fitful breath. The woman struggled and choked for a while, with her thin hands pressed to her side.

"Yours is a bad cough," Reuben said at last.

"There's not much more left of it or me," was the callous answer, "and thank God for it."

"Is not the room too hot for you?"

The woman shook her head.

It was an unhealthy air that the huge fire had burned up, and there was a strange smell of hot metal, for which Reuben could not account, and which the flat-iron on the hob, had it been in the most active service of ironing, could scarcely stand as an excuse for. An extensive plumbing job would have left traces in the atmosphere like unto it, possibly.

"You have come for her," said Mrs. Eastbell, in a husky voice, returning once more to the subject which had brought on her paroxysm of coughing; "but you can't prove nothing."

bed now, with her big dark eyes regarding the speaker, and her hands clasped together tightly.

"It is too late," she muttered.

"I hope not."

"Oh yes," she replied, with grim confidence in her assertion, "by a long sight. Ah! when I saw you last, I did not think that it would come to this, Sir—that I should have to run away from grandmother. I felt so strong. I was sure that I should grow stronger as I got to be more of a woman; and see now where I am. O my God, see now!" cried Sarah Eastbell, with a sudden passion, as she raised her hands above her head, in angry protest against her own ill fate.

"I don't see what's the use of shrieking out like that," said Mrs. Eastbell, reprovingly; "they'll think down stairs we're a-murdering of you. You came away with Tom of your own accord—didn't you? and Tom and I has taken care of you since, and kept you out of the way of the perlice—hasn't us? This isn't such a sight of complaint to bring against a hard-working couple, is it, Mr. Cutstick?"

"You came to London with your brother?" said Reuben to his cousin.

"What was I to do?" replied the girl; "it was that or the prison, though I wouldn't have cared for the prison so very much, only they would have called at the almshouses and taken me away from that poor old woman, who would have thought the worst of me forever afterward."

"I don't think that she would."

"I have told her so many lies," said Sarah, moodily, "and they would have all come out, and set her against me."

"They were white lies, to keep her mind at rest."

"THE DOOR WAS CAUTIOUSLY OPENED."

Once more had his manner and appearance suggested a detective officer—it was only the policeman who haunted such places as he had seen to-night, and who made himself obtrusive and objectionable.

"Yes, I have come for her, if she'll trust me."

"You're just the chap for the likes of us to trust," said Mrs. Eastbell, ironically, "and poor Sally is sure to be uncommon glad to see you. Not that she'll mind much which way it is, for she's been awful down."

"Indeed! Has she?"

"If it ain't Worcester Prison, it 'll be the Surrey Canal.—Here! hi! Sally!" screamed the woman. "You're fetched, my gal. Here's a cove from Worcester says he wants you partikler."

The girl lying upon the bed sprang up on her hands at once, and glared toward them both, shaking her long black hair from her head as she did so. Her face was flushed with sleep, but the pallor rapidly stole over it as she recognized Reuben Culwick standing by the fire-place observing her.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE APPEAL.

"MR. CULWICK!" Sarah Eastbell whispered to herself.

"Yes, it is I," said Reuben.

"What can you want?" she murmured. "What has made you come in search of me?"

"To help you," was the answer; "for I am afraid that you are in bad hands, and I wish to take you from them."

Sarah Eastbell was sitting on the side of the

"Ah! but what a lot of them there were!" said Sarah. "Why, I began to lie for the sake of lying at last, for the sake of brightening her up when she was dull and thoughtful, just as I do now by letter. I used to invent all kinds of— Oh! I can't think of it any more; I can't —I daren't. If I could only die now!"

"Sarah Eastbell, you must come away with me," said Reuben, firmly.

"No," was the reply; "it's only by hiding here that I'm safe. They're after me still—every where," she added, with a shudder.

"Your brother tells you that?"

"I know it for myself too well."

"Did you attempt to pass bad money in Worcester, then?"

"Yes."

"Knowing it to be bad?"

"No, no; I did not know that. Somebody gave it me—I won't say who it was—to get change, and then pay myself what was owing, and—"

"Sarah!" cried Mrs. Eastbell, "the least said about that to this gent the better."

"Come with me to Worcester, and tell the story for yourself," said Reuben. "I will stand by you."

"And see you carried off to jail," said Mrs. Eastbell. "Well, that's pretty nice advice for a man to give a weak young thing like you."

"No, no; let me be, please; what's the use?" muttered Sarah Eastbell. "I must go on as I am—there's no help for me; I'm past your help, Mr. Culwick—though I didn't think you were so good a man as this," she added, with a strange, yearning look toward him, "or that you would take all this trouble, and I'm thankful—very; but to get away from here is to kill the only friend I ever had."

"Your grandmother?"

"Yes."

"She may hear of this at any moment."

"Ay—she may," said Sarah Eastbell, sadly, "and then she will die."

"Have you any idea of what your future life is to be in this place?" asked Reuben.

"I haven't thought much. I can't think," replied his cousin, with a strange helplessness. "I mayn't come to much harm—I don't know."

"Would not any thing be better than remaining?"

"There's no getting away," answered Sarah. "Ask her."

"Tom wouldn't like it," said Mrs. Eastbell, thus appealed to. "Sally's handy."

"And Sally knows too much," added the girl, scornfully; "and if she moved one step away from home—see, this is my home!" she cried, with another exhibition of passion, as she looked round the four walls of the squalid room —"they would tell the police where to find me."

"I wouldn't, Sally," said the woman, raising her head from the wall, and inclining it forward in her self-defense.

"You know who would."

"Ah! I can't answer for him," replied Mrs. Eastbell, leaning her head back again; "when his back's up he don't much mind what he does, certainly, and misfortun' has soured him awful."

"Your husband?" inquired Reuben.

"I don't mention no names," said the woman, with low cunning.

Sarah left the side of the bed and walked to the door, which she opened and listened at.

"I'd go now," she said, anxiously, to Reuben; "it's no use stopping longer—it isn't safe."

Reuben was puzzled at her manner, and perplexed by her stubbornness. Here was a girl in the toils, a woman hemmed in, and who, without money and friends, without hope even, must infallibly give up. She must drift, as he had told Lucy that she would. He felt almost powerless in the matter; and yet she had been an unselfish and honest girl, and might under other circumstances have been so easily saved. There was one more train of reasoning to urge—he could not leave her to her fate without a struggle.

"I saw your grandmother yesterday."

"You did?" exclaimed she—"at Worcester?"

"Yes."

"I hope she was well—that she didn't know any thing?" was her eager questioning.

"No—she lay there just as I saw her weeks ago—very patient, very gentle, and very full of love for you. She was waiting for her granddaughter to come back."

"Ah! if I could!"

"Couldn't she come to you? I don't mean at once," he added, as Sarah recoiled at the suggestion, "but after you had left here and got some situation which might enable you to hire a room for her. A friend of mine has found a situation for you already, and I will be security for your faithful service until they learn to trust you for yourself."

Sarah broke down at last. The thin little hands went up quickly to the face, as he had seen Tots's at home in times of childish tribulation, and she sobbed forth,

"God bless you, Sir; but don't—oh, don't say another word!"

But Reuben Culwick, carried away by his theme, seized his advantage and went on. He had one object in life now—to get Sarah Eastbell from that house.

"Why, you are my cousin," he said, earnestly, "and why shouldn't I help you for your own sake, as well as for the sake of that old woman grieving for you down in Worcester? You can't be worse off in Worcester Prison—say that that's the worst—than in this den."

"No, no—but she would hear of it. I have told you so," she added, peevishly, "or you don't know—you don't see—"

"Sally," said her sister-in-law, slowly and emphatically, "I've been a-thinking it all over."

"Well?" said Sarah Eastbell.

"And if you'd like to go, I'll not blab a single word against you, even if he kills me, and he's often said he would. He mayn't find you out, and if he does he'll think twice about doing you an ill turn. He's not so bad, you know, take him altogether. Go—run away—hook it," exclaimed Mrs. Eastbell, with increasing excitement evidencing itself along with her slangy phraseology, "while there's time!"

Sarah wavered, for she turned quickly to her sister-in-law.

"You—you mean this?"

"Yes."

"You will not tell Tom, or Tom's friends—you will let me pass from this place unwatched—you will give me time to get away?"

"Of course I will."

"I came here of my own free-will, Sir, not knowing where to go in my despair and fright," she said, turning to Reuben; "but, oh! if I could get away again. If you only knew that—"

Her hands fell helplessly to her side, and she went backward step by step to the bedside again, where she sat down with a new horror on her countenance.

The door had opened, and Tom Eastbell, with his long great-coat buttoned round him, was standing in the doorway regarding them. Over his shoulder loomed the forbidding countenance of the man who had met Reuben at the entrance, which, by the jarring and clanging that echoed through the house, was evidently being bolted and barred and locked with a mysterious and suspicious precipitancy.

Reuben Culwick was not greatly dismayed, but there came a strong suspicion to his mind that he was in danger.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JANE H.—The demi-polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 43, Vol. VI., is an excellent model for your black silk suit. Read description of it and suggestions about trimming in New York Fashions of that number.

PLAIN WOMAN.—See "Ugly Girl" papers for directions about the complexion. Glycerine prevents tan when used before going out, and in time its constant use removes it.

OLYMPE.—Add one drop of attar of roses and two of oil of jasmine to each ounce of oil. Glycerine softens and protects the skin.

MINNEHAHA.—Consult a physician for the cure you wish.—Collar and cuff boxes of large size, worked on silver paper with chenille, or on canvas with worsted and beads, are convenient presents to gentlemen.

AUTUMN.—Any thin white varnish will preserve leaves. Apply to the druggist or paint dealer. Press the leaves with a warm iron between sheets of paper, and varnish on both sides.

UGLY DAISY.—Eat much farinaceous food, sugar, and milk, with fat meat and vegetables, and live in the sun. Half a pint of beet juice with one scale of gum-tragacanth boiled in it makes a more lasting color than rouge, but cold water and friction are better still.

BETTY WHITE.—See No. XXV. of "Ugly Girl" papers, to be published.

SUBSCRIBER.—Sponge the nose and gargle the throat before going to bed with a lotion of equal parts of glycerine and rose-water, with ten drops of carbolic acid to the ounce; see that the digestion is good, and keep the head bent forward in sleep as much as possible, to prevent snoring.

BLONDE.—Brushing the hair a great deal will keep it light. The hair is steeped in Champagne to which a little turmeric is added, and suffered to dry in the sun.

LEONIE.—We have not space for a list of the works on skin diseases; but your physician will name them, and will doubtless procure one for you. Carbolic acid in the proportion of twenty drops to the ounce of glycerine will not injure the skin, and is of service in many diseases. Carbolic soap is excellent. Glycerine merely protects the skin; it has no medicinal qualities. We do not purchase and send books.

A READER OF THE BAZAR.—Burke's or Debrett's Peerage, which may be found at most of the public libraries, will give you information concerning the coats of arms of noble English families. There is a Heralds' College, we believe, in London, which you might also address on the subject.

L. M.—There are several institutions in New York, we believe, such as the Children's Aid Society, Home for the Friendless, etc., that are glad to place friendless children in good homes in the West. A letter addressed to the secretary of one of these societies, specifying your wishes, and giving references as to your responsibility, will probably receive attention.

L. S. N.—Make your white tarlatan with puffs down the front breadths, separated by pinked ruches of green tarlatan, and flounce the back. Make a puffed basque over a tight lining, and puff the sleeves to the elbow, with ruffles below.

MISS C. S.—The Pompadour bustles are imported by few French modistes, are difficult to get, and cost rom $8 to $12. They are worn with ordinary dress kirts.

MANY QUESTIONS.—Trim your alpaca with four bias piped bands, and on these place diagonal bands with a button on each end. Water-proof cloaks are not lined usually, but the purple flannel is not objectionable. Hem the edges. Simple suits are trimmed alike all around. Elaborate silks and velvets are different in back and front.

THE VIENNA EXHIBITION.

AUSTRIAN COURT HONOR TO AN AMERICAN CONTRIBUTOR.

Telegrams to the New York Herald.

VIENNA, Nov. 1, 1873.

The Emperor of Austria has conferred the "Imperial Order of Francis Joseph" upon Hon. Nathaniel Wheeler, President of the celebrated Wheeler & Wilson Sewing-Machine Company, of New York.

MORE DISTINGUISHED HONORS.

BALTIMORE, Md., Oct. 31.—The Maryland Institute has awarded Wheeler & Wilson the gold medal for the new No. 6 Sewing-Machine. Other sewing-machines received nothing.—[Com.]

A YOUTH'S PUBLICATION.—For nearly half a century the Youth's Companion, of Boston, has been published. It was started in 1827, and is to-day one of the brightest and most vigorous papers with which we are acquainted.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DEAFNESS AND CATARRH.—A Lady who had suffered for years from Deafness and Catarrh was cured by a simple Indian Remedy. Her sympathy and gratitude prompt her to send the recipe, free of charge, to any one similarly afflicted. Address MRS. M. CLARA LEGGETT, Jersey City, N. J.

PARIS NOVELTIES ☞ JUST RECEIVED.

The Elegant "PANSY" Corset, the GRACEFUL Corset, NEW BUSTLES, Embroidered Underwear, Undressed Kid Gloves, Fine Fans, and Gift Goods.

J. C. DEVIN,
Under Sturtevant House, 1192 Broadway.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND

Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS

502-504 Broadway,

Offer for the Season their entire Stock of

Ladies' Furs,

including a Very Extensive and Elegant Assortment of

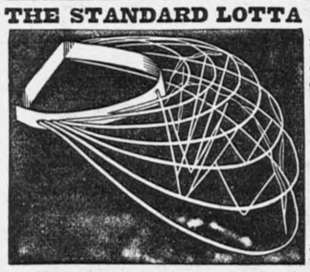
Seal-Skin Furs,

in all Styles and Qualities, at greatly

Reduced Prices.

502-504 Broadway.

THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE. ☞ ASK YOUR STOREKEEPER FOR IT.



A diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee & Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.

A. SELIG,

(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),

No. 813 Broadway, New York,

Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.

Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

EXQUISITELY PERFUMED.

BARRY'S

TRICOPHEROUS

Removes all impurities from the scalp, prevents baldness and gray hair, and causes the

HAIR TO GROW

THICK, SOFT, & BEAUTIFUL.

Sold by Druggists every where.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

BEAUTIFY THE SKIN

BY USING

LAIRD'S

"Bloom of Youth."

This harmless & delightful toilet preparation will remove all discolorations and blemishes from the skin, leaving it SOFT, CLEAR, SMOOTH, and BEAUTIFUL.

SOLD AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

THREE PAIR

Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, and Dress-Trimmings. A splendid Black Dress Silk, $1 25 yard. Heavy Black Silk Velvet, only $2 yard—worth double. Samples sent free.

FINE FURS

of every description at less than manufacturers' prices. ☞ Send for Price-List. All goods selected therefrom sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

200 PIANOS and ORGANS, New and Second-hand, of First-Class Makers, will be sold at LOWER PRICES for cash, or on installments, or for rent, in CITY or COUNTRY, during this financial crisis, by

HORACE WATERS & SON,

No. 481 BROADWAY,

than ever before offered in New York. ☞ AGENTS WANTED for the sale of Waters' CELEBRATED PIANOS, CONCERTO, and ORCHESTRAL ORGANS. Illustrated Catalogues mailed. Great Inducements to the Trade.

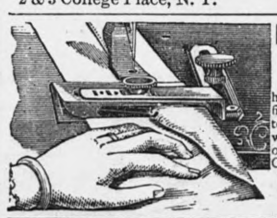
ALUMINOUS AND ORNAMENTAL

BUILDING PAPER

Paper Carpeting and Oil Cloth.

Send for Samples and Price-List.

W. H. H. ROGERS & CO., 2 & 3 College Place, N. Y. F. N. DAVIS & CO., Beloit, Wis.



BARTLETT'S HEMMERS

hem all goods, coarse or fine, any width, from 1-16 to 2 inches; hem elastic worsted, cut bias; hem over seams. Send for Circular.

W. H. MACLAUGHLIN,
360 Main St., Buffalo, N. Y.

Pat. Indispensable Skirt Elevator,

Instantly changing Skirt from Train to Walking, and Walking to Train.

Price 35c. each. Three free by mail for $1. Free by mail, 40c. each. 1 doz. free by mail for $3, with full directions. Call or send to W. H. JOHNSTON, 267 Broadway, N. Y. Agents wanted.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.

AGENTS WANTED.

SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

The New Florence

Is the only Sewing-Machine that feeds the work backward and forward, or to the right and left, as the purchaser may prefer. It has been greatly IMPROVED & SIMPLIFIED, and is far better than any other machine now in the market. ☞ FLORENCE SEWING-MACHINE COMPANY, Florence, Mass.

For Marking Clothing.

Lottie Lane

A Stencil Plate, like cut, with brush and indelible ink, postpaid, for 50c. Umbrella Plate, with name and address, ready to attach, 35c. Circulars free. J. F. MARSH, S. E. cor. Second and Dock, Phila., Pa.

RUNNING FERN.—I can now supply all persons with this Beautiful Decorative Vine. ☞ 100 pieces pressed, $5 00; 100 pieces, not pressed, $2 50. Address, A. A. WILLIAMS, Hartford, Conn.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & Co., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

FRENCH STAMPING MATERIALS, IN ANY quantity. Complete working samples sent free. W. J. CURRIER, Park Hotel, New York City.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular.
MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

LADIES! JUST THE PAPER FOR YOU!!!

Send stamp for Specimen Copy ☞ Free.

The Ladies' Floral Cabinet. A beautiful NEW Home Paper, devoted to Flowers, Window Gardening, and Parlor Decorations. Exquisitely illustrated. Ladies will be delighted with it. Delightful home pictures of society and Amusements, with useful hints on housekeeping and Elegancies.

Price $1 50 per year, including 3 Choice Chromos.
" $1 25 " " " 1 " "
Price 25 cents on trial three months.

GET UP A CLUB. AGENTS WANTED. Premium List Free.

Window Gardening. A New Book, superbly illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Bulbs, and Flowers for in-doors, with handsome illustrations of Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Sent, postpaid, by mail. Book Stores have it.

The Ladies' Cabinet Initial Note-Paper.

Rose or Violet Tinted; your own initial. Handsome present. Highly perfumed. Attractive Chromo on each Box. Price 50c. a Box. 100 PAPERS AT CLUB RATES. Send Stamp for List Free. Address

"LADIES' FLORAL CABINET,"
5 Beekman Street, Room 5, New York.

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.

4th Grand Gift Concert

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.

12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.

$250,000 FOR $50.

The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.

Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.

At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.

$1,500,000

LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.

PRICE OF TICKETS:

Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22½ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.

The time for the drawing is near at hand, and persons intending to purchase tickets have no time to loose.

THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,
Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert, Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

Or THOS. H. HAYS & CO.,
609 BROADWAY, New York.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. Printed Directions accompany each Pattern. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	No. 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER	" 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)	" 6
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 20
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER	" 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)	" 25
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)	" 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old)	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)	" 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT	" 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 46
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)	" 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT	" 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind. Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)	" 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT	" 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT	" 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT	" 39
DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, with Basque Back and Square Front	" 43
TIGHT-FITTING DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE, with French Round Skirt	" 45
SINGLE-BREASTED BASQUINE, with Short Pouf Walking Skirt	" 47
DOUBLE-BREASTED PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron Front and Square Back Over-skirt and Long Walking Skirt	" 47
DOLMAN DEMI-TRAINED SUIT	" 48

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

Hosted by Google

DRY GOODS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

LADIES', CHILDREN'S, AND INFANTS' OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT.

MISSES' IRISH POPLIN AND SERGE SUITS.
" BLUE & GRAY FLANNEL SAILOR SUITS.
LADIES' SILK AND CASHMERE MORNING ROBES.
LADIES' UNDERCLOTHING, our own and Paris manufacture.
OUTFITS of every description, ready-made and to order.
FRENCH AND GERMAN CORSETS, &c.

GARMENTS,

AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

PARIS & CITY-MADE PLAIN & EMBROIDERED CAMEL'S-HAIR POLONAISE AND COSTUMES.
PARIS-MADE EVENING & RECEPTION DRESSES.
VELVET POLONAISE AND SACQUES.
VIEGOGNES' SUITS, with Silk & Poplin Underskirts.

MOURNING GOODS.

Full and Complete Lines of every description, for Fall and Winter wear, suitable for Deep and Second Mourning. ☞ Veil and Trimming Crapes, Handkerchiefs, Sets, &c.

FANCY AND STAPLE DRESS GOODS,
AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

HOSIERY,
UNDERWEAR,
CLOTHS,
WHITE GOODS,
BLANKETS,
FLANNELS, &c., &c.

FUR DEPARTMENT.

SEAL SACQUES, MUFF, BOA, and CAP to match.
" " " " trimmed with Otter.
LADIES' and GENTS' SEAL CAPS, GLOVES, AND COLLARS.
SABLE, MINK, CHINCHILLA, ERMINE, BLACK MARTEN, and other sets.
FUR TRIMMINGS.
FUR ROBES.
LADIES' FUR-LINED CARRIAGE CLOAKS, &c.

Broadway, corner Nineteenth Street.

STERN BROTHERS,

Sixth Ave. & Twenty-Third St.,

367 SIXTH AVENUE, 367
110 WEST 23d STREET, 110

Beg to call attention to the ☞ UNPARALLELD INDUCEMENTS they are now offering in their LACE DEPARTMENT.

The prices at which we are now selling them are fully 33 per cent. less than they have been sold in years.

An immense assortment of
BLACK AND COLORED YAK LACES
at 24c., 30c., 36c., 42c., 48c., and upward, from two to four inches wide.
REAL GUIPURE AND THREAD LACES,
From 9c. a yard upward.
FRENCH BLONDE AND VALENCIENNES LACES,
Extremely low prices.
HAMBURG EDGINGS AND INSERTIONS,
The largest assortment in the city.

In consequence of the unsettled state of trade, we have succeeded in purchasing

FOR CASH,

Three Entire Cases of
BLACK AND COLORED TRIMMING VELVET,
At 40c. on the dollar.
BLACK SILK TRIMMING VELVETS,
At $1 50, $1 85, $2 00, $2 35, $2 50, splendid quality and finish.
COLORED SILK TRIMMING VELVETS,
From $1 a yard upward.
All the newest shades of Myrtle, Mauve, Bronze, &c.
☞ 28 inches CLOAKING VELVETS, at $3 75, $4 38, $4 75, superior quality.
GUINET. & CIE finest all-silk Cloak Velvets—26 in. wide, $8 00 yard; 34 in. wide, $10 50 yard.

IN OUR TRIMMING DEPARTMENT,

We are now displaying the richest selection of BLACK PASSEMENTERIE TRIMMINGS, BEADED AND PLAIN SILK FRINGES, ORNAMENTS, LOOPS, AND BUTTONS to be found in the city, all our own importations. ☞ Prices speak for themselves.
Particular attention paid to orders.
SAMPLES AND PRICES of above lines of goods sent freely upon application.

Stern Brothers.

EHRICH & CO.,

287 & 289 8th AVE., Near 24th ST., New York.

Send Stamp for our

36 page FALL CATALOGUE

The most complete Price-List of Millinery, Fancy, and Furnishing Goods ever issued.

Furs our own Manufacture,

&c., &c., &c.

☞ Goods shipped C.O.D., to any part of the country, with full power of examination before acceptance.

FALL IMPORTATIONS!!!

Miller & Grant,

No. 879 Broadway,

Are offering Worsted Embroidery in colors. Also, Worsted Fringes and Gimp, to match. Smoked Pearl Buttons and Slides. ☞ The most desirable Articles in Market.

CURL YOUR HAIR.—A new Scientific Discovery. It can be done in 5 minutes. Particulars free. Address SOUTHWESTERN AGENCY, Carthage, Mo.

A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.
A DELICATE SOAP FOR THE TOILET.
CASHMERE BOUQUET CASHMERE BOUQUET
MADE BY COLGATE & COMPANY,
NEW YORK.

KNABE

Grand, Square, & Upright Pianos,
New York House, No. 112 5th Ave.
WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

	PAGE
Frontispiece	2
Almanac, Eclipses, etc.	4
Calendar	5–16
Spring, by Frank Bellew	17
One of the Old Land-marks, by Commodore Rollingpin	18–20
Dido Dumb, by John F. M'Ardle	21–23
William Shakspeare, by Thomas Butler Gunn	24–27
Babys, by Josh Billings	28
Summer, by Frank Bellew	29
A Deception, by Mark Twain	30–31
Peter Jones, the Model Hero, by Com. Rollingpin	31–34
The Phunny Man, by Josh Billings	34
Autumn, by Frank Bellew	35
Home, Sweet Home, by G. P. Webster	36–39
The Usual Christmas Pantomime	40–43
Winter, by Frank Bellew	44
Rates of Postage	45–48

And 86 Illustrations by THOMAS NAST.

SINGLE COPIES, 25 CENTS.

5 copies sent to one address, postage prepaid, on receipt of $1.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

$375 A MONTH to Male or Female Agents. NOVELTY COMPANY, Biddeford, Me.

Every baby must have it. Is THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 532 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

FRENCH EMBROIDERIES AND STAMPING.—V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N. Y. Lingerie, Ladies' and Babies' Trousseau. Direct importation. Finest stock on hand. Orders filled with care. Specialty of Monograms. MACHINES and Perforated PATTERNS.

HAS NEVER BEEN EQUALED.

Teaches practical piano playing and theoretical music thoroughly. Clarke's New Method for the PIANO-FORTE carries the pupil by easy gradations to the highest practical results.

Sent by Mail, Price $3.75

LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

SAMPLES FREE!!—The Saturday Evening Post, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, gives a beautiful Chromo or large Steel Engraving to every yearly subscriber! Samples free!

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00; postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.
PIKE'S SUB-TROPICAL RAMBLES. Sub-Tropical Rambles in the Land of the Aphanapteryx. By NICOLAS PIKE, U. S. Consul, Port Louis, Mauritius. Profusely Illustrated from the Author's own Sketches; containing also Maps and valuable Meteorological Charts. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

II.
DAWSON'S EARTH AND MAN. The Story of the Earth and Man. By J. W. DAWSON, LL.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University, Montreal. With Twenty Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

III.
THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

IV.
NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1874. With 86 Original Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. Price 25 cents.

V.
FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

VI.
TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

THE NEW NOVELS
OF
THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.
HARPER'S LIBRARY EDITION OF WILKIE COLLINS'S NOVELS. Now ready:
THE NEW MAGDALEN.—THE WOMAN IN WHITE.—POOR MISS FINCH. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 each. Other volumes will be issued shortly.

2.
THE TWO WIDOWS. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "Called to Account," "Played Out," "A Passion in Tatters," "The Dower House," "Maud Mohan," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

3.
MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

4.
STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

5.
A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

6.
HARPER'S HOUSEHOLD DICKENS. With Original Characteristic Illustrations by American and British Artists. The following volumes are now ready:
OLIVER TWIST. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.
MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.
DAVID COPPERFIELD. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
DOMBEY AND SON. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
NICHOLAS NICKLEBY. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
BLEAK HOUSE. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
PICKWICK PAPERS. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
LITTLE DORRIT. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS and a book of forty pages mailed for FIFTY CENTS, by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N. Y.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LININGTON, Chicago.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$10 to $20 per day. Agents wanted every where. Particulars free. A. H. BLAIR & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

Hosted by Google

IN THE PRIVACY OF HIS OWN CHAMBER.

ON THE STREET.

IN THE BOSOM OF HIS FAMILY

FROM CHURCH.

WITHOUT AND WITHIN—THE MAN OF HIGH STANDING AT HOME AND ABROAD.

FACETIÆ.

A TELEGRAPH operator last month summoned a doctor thus: "Come at once to see procession of Carlo Spencer's menagerie." The message, when "repeated," read: "Come at once with prescription—case of cerebro-spinal meningitis."

RULES FOR RAILWAY TRAVELING.—First make your will. Order your coffin to be sent home on the following day, and issue invitations to your funeral. Insure your life in as many different companies, and to as large an amount, as possible. Take no luggage; you will not require any in the place to which you are going. Bid farewell to your family, say your prayers, and meet your fate like a true American.

A prudent clergyman, unwilling to accuse a citizen of lying, said he used the truth with penurious frugality.

DOUBTFUL LUXURY.

ETHEL. "Were you not pleased to have such a pretty partner as Miss Myrtle at croquet yesterday, Charlie?"

CHARLIE. "Well—er—personally, I dislike beauty. Acknowledged belles have a way of making a fellow feel himself of secondary consideration sometimes, don't you know?"

CRIMINAL ASSOCIATIONS—Handcuffs.

HENRI CINQ.

Halfred and 'Arry meeting, and discussing French Politics.

HALFRED. "I say, 'Arry, what 'll this 'ere County Shambor call 'imself if he comes to the throne?"

'ARRY. "Well, you see, considerin' if he comes up to the surface, they oughtn't to call him 'Enry Sank, but 'Enry Rose."

ALTERATION IN THE CUT.—Modern mechanical inventions are so rapidly superseding the old-fashioned implement, the scythe, that Time ought in future to be represented with a mowing-machine.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

MITHER. "Now, Jean, when the folks come to tea, mind ye divert them as muckle as ye can. And, Jean, when the cakes and sic-like things are han'ed round, be mannerly, and set the example by just sayin', 'No, thankye,' to it all."

REMEDY FOR THE NAILERS' STRIKE—Knock it on the head.

The proverb, "Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day," is beautifully and tastily exemplified by the school-boy who polishes off his birthday cake on the day of receipt.

VOICES OF THE NIGHT—LIVING NEXT DOOR TO A DOCTOR.

SMALL BOY. "Oh, Sir, Mrs. Grum's got awful Pains in her Back, and wants you to come up there right away!"

[This is the fifth time to-night that Mr. Simkins has been roused from his bed to say that he is not Dr. Galen.

HINTS FOR THE HOUSEHOLD.

To restore Faded Flowers.—Obtain a small deal box; carefully place the flowers therein, fill with cotton wadding, fasten down the lid, and address the box to the person who presented the flowers. Take it to the express office, and in a few days they will be restored.

To obtain Chiccory.—Go to a cheap grocer's and purchase a pound of the best Java coffee. Chiccory is in such demand that it can be obtained in no other way by retail.

To make Soda-Water.—Dissolve a quarter of a pound of common soda in a gallon of water; afterward bottle for use. This is cheaper than that sold at the shops, and different in flavor.

To thicken the Hair.—Take two ounces of molasses, two ounces of glue, and one ounce of Roman cement. Mix, and apply before going to bed. It will make the hair very thick. Perfume to taste.

To avoid the Smell of Onions.—Carefully sprinkle the room with disinfecting fluid or chloride of lime mixed with water. Another plan is to leave the house at once.

A simple Electrical Apparatus.—Obtain a little gun-cotton. Place in a box, and present to your wife. Tell her it won't burn. If she disputes the accuracy of your assertion, let her try the experiment. The effect will be electrical.

Impressions from Coins.—Carefully heat the coin. When red-hot place it on your bare arm, when a good impression will be obtained. This is a very interesting experiment. The coin may then be carefully cooled and expended for ointment.

A CRIMINAL'S WORSHIP—The magistrate.

When is the fall of night like a boy being whipped?—Why, when it raises little howls.

A BAD HABIT TO GET INTO—A coat that's not paid for.

MORE PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.—"Who goes a-borrowin' goes a-sorrowin'." More often it is "the other way up." Who goes a-lending too often goes a-sorrowin', while who goes a-borrowin' not unfrequently goes on his way rejoicing at his dexterity.

Postal cards are shortly to be issued in the Dutch Indies on rather curious conditions. If the contents appear to the post-office official to be of an insulting nature, the card will be sent under cover to its address.

A good old elder of a church who was given to extravagant exaggeration, was at last called to account for his offenses in that respect, and admonished not to give way to the besetting sin in future. The good old man received the admonition meekly, and earnestly said: "I know how prone I am to this fault, my brethren, and it has given me tortures of pain; and night after night I have shed barrels of tears over it." The meeting adjourned in silence.

THE LADIES' CABIN.

SCENE ON BOARD OUR FERRY-BOATS.

A HUMANE REQUEST.

FOND MOTHER. "Please administer the Gas to my little Boy. I am obliged to Whip him, and I wish him to Suffer as little as is consistent with my Notions of Dooty."

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 49.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress. at Washington.

IMITATION OF BRONZE ORNAMENTS.

VASES, or other ornaments of clay or earthenware, may be converted into very handsome bronze articles by a simple process. The vases chosen for this work are to be without glazing, and of the most beautiful shapes that can be found. The first thing is to coat them with copal varnish into which has been worked the color desired—either vermilion or chrome-green will be best. Or, as some prefer, let the color be mixed with turpentine and applied first, then, when dry, varnish over it. If there are to be medallions with patterns drawn upon the fronts, let them be painted on this ground before varnishing. When the varnish is almost dry, dust bronze powder over the whole surface, and rub very lightly with a silk or woolen rag until the whole is burnished. Those painted with vermilion will have a golden or copper-colored tinge, while the green ones will be like pure bronze. If a still higher gloss is desired, add another coat of varnish.

Fig. 1.—VIOLET POPLIN DRESS. FRONT.—[See Fig. 5.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-8.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—SUIT FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—BLUE VIGOGNE DRESS. BACK.—[See Fig. 6.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 9-14.

Fig. 5.—VIOLET POPLIN DRESS. BACK.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-8.

Fig. 6.—BLUE VIGOGNE DRESS. FRONT.—[See Fig. 4.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 9-14.

FIGS. 1-6.—LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S WINTER HOUSE DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

THE PATIENT WAITER.

ONCE on a time a pitcher-plant
Made the brook-side its summer haunt,
Waiting, perhaps, till the stream should swell
And fill its pitcher—who can tell?

Close beside it the flag-flower grew,
A knot of purple, fringed with dew,
Which tossed in the wind, and laughed in the brook,
That gladly answered it, look for look.

Nodding unto its neighbor, it said,
"Dip in your pitcher; don't be afraid;
Unless you think that the brook will run
To you, ere the summer holiday's done.

"Where's the advantage of sitting still,
When you've an empty pitcher to fill?
Up, then, laggard, and go to the rill—
If you don't fill it, prithee who will?"

But the flag-flower's taunt changed to a sigh,
When it felt the shower hastening by,
Which tore its petals proud and prim,
But filled the pitcher-plant to the brim.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 29 was sent out gratuitously an illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, containing the opening chapters of FARJEON'S new CHRISTMAS STORY, entitled with characteristic illustrations. Further installments are also given of LORD LYTTON'S "PARISIANS" and TROLLOPE'S "PHINEAS REDUX."

"GOLDEN GRAIN,"

Another illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 6.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of a Lady's Waterproof Cloak, with Cape and Sleeves; and a Tight-fitting Single-breasted Redingote House Dress, will be published with our next Number. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 783.

THOUGHTS ON FASHION.

IT is a habit with many people who accustom themselves to emphatic enunciations of presumed truths to speak, among other things, of fashion (so called) in the most ignoble terms; to ridicule it while they condemn it, calling it now an arbitrary mistress with its rod, and now a fantastic fool with its follies; moralizing upon it always as a wicked waster of substance, a robber of the poor, an altogether debasing element of modern existence. There are good people in the world who think that to be in the fashion is to be in the broad way leading to destruction; and there is many a remote village where the stranger, whose attire of a Sunday wears the air Parisienne, must expect to be made the subject of scandalous remark, as being open to suspicion, and more or less a person in complicity with the Scarlet Woman. It was in such places nearly twenty years ago that the introduction of the hoop was struggled against as being an attempt to return to the evil days and evil ways of the elder reign of hoops, and it is in such places at the present moment that the abolition of hoops is just as eagerly struggled against as being a concession to immodesty.

But there are yet other people who would laugh at the narrowness of the good villagers, but who yet esteem it a virtue in themselves that they do not follow the fashions closely. It may not be a crime in their eyes to do so, but it is a weakness; and they are constantly offering silent and Pharisaic thanks that they are not like those publicans and sinners who are guilty of the weakness.

Yet these very innocents are complacently smoothing the wrinkles out of last year's fashion while they villify the fashions of this year; and for what reason they consider the said last year's fashion to be any thing more righteous than this year's, or why, since they yield to fashion at all in condescending to wear any thing but the original skin of wild beasts, they feel it necessary to pause halfway in the condescension, is among the unraveled mysteries.

Yet there must be something very singular in the state of mind of such people, not only in the taste which fails to perceive that a person is far more offensively conspicuous when out of the fashion than when in it, not only in that or in the insular conceit which dares to set up a single opinion against the combined and generally accepted opinions of the day, but in the vulgar ignorance as well of the whole scope and science of fashion.

For fashion is indeed but the science of dress—an empiric science, as medicine and some other sciences are. It gropes its way along, sometimes right and sometimes wrong, but always moving, and always actuated by the wish to remember that beauty and grace are as important as bare utility. Each change that it ordains, when a change of any material weight, fulfills a double purpose: the one experimental in the effort to find something nearer the ideal standard than has yet been gained, the other æsthetic in the effort to refresh the eye, already weary with the thousand and one adaptations of the mode that are met at every turn. And though the result of this latter effort may not be one of the physical necessities of life, it is at any rate an intellectual luxury, and it endeavors to satisfy the love of elegance and the desire for change, while at the same time it once in a while attains to the dignity of expressing the normal instinct of a race in relation to its clothing.

It is, moreover, no court favorite or man-milliner that sits and evolves from the depths of any inner consciousness the variations of the prevailing style. Once in a while some accidental thing of the kind may occur, but it would be a very shallow and silly view of so universal an interest that would support such an idea. The fashion is in the main dictated, and almost always modified, by climate and by ruling events of the day. We have seen in times of great wars and wide public calamity black and white become the standard colors of dress; and certain laces and silks and other fabrics have become favorites when it has been found desirable to revive a prostrate industry; heavy gold ornaments came in with the discovery of the Californian and Australian gold; peculiar jewels have received pre-eminence when found to abound in a conquered province, as frequently some marked feature of the dress of the conquered people has been adopted by the conquerors through motives of policy; and we read that to-day, out of compliment to the Shah, a guest at the European courts, Persian stuffs and designs are in request. In all such instances no one person has ever set the fashion, but it has been adopted by a spontaneous and general instinct in accordance with some great event or line of events.

We see, too, the effects of climate at the merest glance. The Oriental's flowing draperies of white, that shed the sunlight, and sweep either the polished floors of the harem or the level sands of the desert, are of necessity a different thing from the attire of the kilted and bare-legged mountaineer, who leaps from rock to rock as unencumbered as he may. Here and there, certainly, we find some striking exception that proves the rule; as when the Brazilian ladies are found wearing furs with the thermometer at 100°, because at that time the Parisian ladies are doing so; or when the English ladies carry the old antipathy of the island to France so far as to refuse to accept the new issues of the mode at Paris till they are a year old, so that you will meet them in any theatre to-day with, for instance, big chignons and mighty châtelaine braids.

We hear a great deal said about the excellences of a national costume; but what an absurdity would not a national costume be for a country—let us say this country—which comprises every variety of temperature, from the swampy heats of Florida to the icy chill of Alaska! Far better, it seems to us, is the central standard which shall adapt itself, with such modifications as may be necessary, to the exigencies of place and weather. With but a few partial instances to the contrary, the civilized races of the day are all to be found within the limits of the temperate zones, and there is no reason why nearly the same modes should not answer for them all—modes changing so gradually that while new material shall be cut to their requirements, the garment already in use shall not seem unpleasantly out of style or be incapable of alteration; and meantime the kindred dress is one of those things that help to make the whole world kin, and save the stranger in a strange land a great deal of discomfort and uneasiness.

To the thinker fashion and its changes are far from being an arbitrary folly. Fashion itself is something that is found to be full of a subtle wisdom. Take, for instance, the fact that with rotten Napoleonism and OFFENBACH music, with an era of tyranny wrapped up in sensual luxury, there returned upon us the dress of a corresponding previous era known as the Pompadour, though so purified and qualified that one could learn, even in the matter of a lady's toilette, that if history repeats itself, it repeats itself in that spiral of growth each return of which is one round higher than the last one, and we will quickly comprehend that fashion also has a philosophy of its own as interesting, if not as profound, as any.

Nor are all the changes of fashion mere whims and notions. They are, on the contrary, evolutions from each other, sequences often as simple and necessary as the conditions of bud and flower and fruit. When short skirts came into use, high heels followed as an accompanying requisite, in order that the foot which the dress displayed might be lifted tidily out of the mud. The circumstance that high heels were again a part of the Pompadour dress was only one of the coincidences in the eternal order of things—that great order which can no more overlook the style of our garments than the bent of our dispositions. The universal adoption of any change may be a thoughtless matter, it is true; but the change itself, you may be sure, had a reason for its being. When expansive crinoline disappeared, the skirts, heavy with flounces, flapped awkwardly about the feet, and hindered all free motion; the panier or bustle came to lift the weight out of the way, and to carry it where it would least encumber the gait—came not as an absurd caprice, but as the answer to a requisition; that it should be adorned with puffs and ruffles was an inevitable feminine consequence. The hat, too, it will be seen, conforms to the situation of the hair, whether that be worn high or low, at the front or the back of the head. And in the wearing of the hair itself lies an example of the whole theory of the minor fashion.

A year or two ago the hair had gone one degree beyond another till, with the tortures of pins and combs and frizzes, and superincumbent loads of braids and curls, the long-suffering chevelure found its strength exhausted, and began to give way, leaving a little bald place at the crown of the head, or, if not already bald yet, one where the growth had become so thin that it had its fate before it; yet, as soon as the fact was discovered, fashion came to the rescue in one of her necessary sequences: the hair was lifted to the top of the head, the incipient baldness was covered and concealed thereby, and the weakened hair, no longer required to support the destructive weight of the past, has time to recover itself; and when the Spanish comb and the high hat followed, they came, the one as an adornment, like that of the rose one twists into a curl, the other as a matter of course. In short, though we might follow out the subject with unlimited illustration, we have said enough to indicate that any careful observer can not fail to see that fashion, so far from being the result of a parcel of idle caprices, as it is too frequently and flippantly denominated, is a series of natural concurrences and progresses, in which there is almost always to be found an upward intention.

THE EXASPERATING WAYS OF WELL AND WORTHILY BELOVED MEN.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

IF a title should be descriptive of a theme, the title of this paper can not properly be curtailed, for the parable is of those honorable and amiable men who are dear to the female heart, yet who will upon occasion unintentionally and, you may say, innocently put the female patience to a strain which would break a ten-inch iron bar.

Will my readers condescend and descend to a cellar—not one of those foul, noisome, and slimy city haunts where decay riots and humanity decays the worst, but a clean, dry, sweet cellar on the hill-side, whereinto the winds may sweep and the bright sun shine—a cellar where people might live and thrive, but into which they penetrate only at rare intervals?

One of these rare intervals has just happened. Your shelves have been duly ordered, your cemented floor swept clean, your boards well scrubbed, cobwebs swept away from windows, and furnaces made ready for winter. Nay, more: to facilitate domestic labors you have yourself built a new bin for the kitchen coal close by the kitchen stairs. You go away light-hearted, as beseems one whose duty is done. You return to find that a tornado of coal has swept over the cellar, and left the black dust an inch deep every where; for those obliging and friendly men who brought your coal and dumped it into the cellar, dumped it without thought or without remorse through the window instead of through the cellar doors. But you told them to take it through the window. Certainly, because you supposed they had a sluice-way down which it would glide, as usual, without ado. But they had no sluice-way, and they dropped their loads plump on the cellar floor. Now, if they had been women, would they not have seen that the coal was rebounding over the floor in all directions, and that the bin was bursting on all sides, and that pulverized carbon was coating all things with its pure defilement, and would they not have stopped and lifted the house off its foundations, or tunneled a channel underneath, or sunk a shaft in China, or have managed in some way to project the coal into the bin without re-introducing chaos and old night?

When the Botanical Club, with the distinguished foreign professor at their head, was botanizing in Swansey-Leigh, Fred was very desirous to entertain them at his house. Loline, who indulges Fred within an inch of his life, said, of course, "Amen—how many?" And Fred answered, indifferently, "Oh, well, twenty or so." Whereupon Loline prepared a banquet for forty, wherewithal she fed fifty. Fred, sauntering man-fashion through the streets, saluted every man he met with the careless invitation, man-fashion, "Come up and see Herr Von Arnim to-morrow." And as the men he met were the ministers, lawyers, and farmers, who, having nothing to do, were sunning themselves on the door-steps, and as the botanists were busy in the fields, and were therefore not met at all, it turned out that a crowd of people saw the great man who could never tell a pistil from a stamen, and only knew that he was great, while the men who had followed him through life, and would have given their rarest specimens to ask him a question or pay him an admiring tribute, staid at home and gnashed their teeth with anger. But the fifty did all eat and were filled, and they took up of the fragments that remained several platterfuls; and by her winning ways and her genuine smiles and her frank truth-telling, Loline has nearly mollified the ninety-and-nine just persons who were not bidden, and by the time the last one has renewed his allegiance, Fred, the generous, the hospitable, the all-benevolent, and wholly incorrigible, will be quite ready to upset his dish again.

"Now," says Sam, big and burly, to his morning visitor, "I must go; I belong to the laboring classes; but you stay here and chat with Susy and make yourself comfortable;" and Sam rubs his hands briskly and departs cheerfully, knowing nothing of Susy's heart-sinking. But are not the precious moments of baby's nap passing swiftly away, and dinner to be seen to, and the children soon to be rushing in from school? and what does Susy care for the Right of Bolting, or the Depreciation of the Currency, or Literature and Dogma, or the Comte de Chambord's Conservatism, compared with getting her work ready for the dress-maker who is coming to-morrow, and conferring with cook about the dinner that awaits a mistress's directions, and arranging the thousand nothings that are never noticed when they are done, but constitute a breakwater that sends the angry spray tossing to the angry skies if they are not done? Oh, Sam, Sam! when you stood before the altar and promised to love and cherish Susy, did you make a mental reservation that you would go off down town when it suited your convenience, and leave her to be bothered with your guest, to her heart-rending inconvenience?

And oh, Sam, why will you track the gravel over Susy's parlor carpet? And oh, Fred, why will you drip the gravy over Loline's fresh table-cloth? And oh, Sam, why will you sop it up with a clean napkin, and think you have done God service? And oh, Fred, why will you never dress for a dinner-party till Loline is drawing on her gloves, and then discover that your sleeve-studs are missing? And oh, Sam, why do you not sit straight and square and compact in the crowded horse-car, and not angle out into twice as much room as you really need?

Simply, I suppose, O Loline and Susy, because they are not you. And perhaps, after all, they might be worse. Perhaps if they were mindful of these little things, they might be fine and finical, though I know a man who is mindful and not finical. It is better to be great-hearted than always to rub your shoes on the door-mat, though happy is that woman whose Sam is the one and does the other. An extra table-cloth now and then does not becloud the sunny sky; but how sad it would be to be married to somebody else who was bent on keeping the cover spotless, and not to Fred, who is so full of healthy activity and mental energy and good cheer that he gesticulates with a ladleful of gravy! I suppose the fact is that all masculine stock is subject to shrinkage; and if that shrinkage is only in little, unimportant matters that do not lay hold of character, or largely affect happiness, or bring a deep and bitter and unutterable disappointment, one would better class them with diversions than try to make capital out of them as trials. If you can not slowly and sweetly change the Ethiopian's skin and the leopard's spots—and the probability is that you can not—the next best thing is to rejoice that your Ethiop, though black, is comely, and that even his spots make the leopard a splendid beast!

Hosted by Google

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MATERIALS FOR CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.

RETRENCHMENT is the order of the day, and reduction of prices is announced at the large dry-goods stores. This reduction is most important and most evident in the warm woolen goods purchased for the winter use of families. For the first time since the war 50 cents a yard is the popular price for the substantial wool fabrics selected for girls' dresses. For instance, among the standard materials French merinoes of pure quality, though not of the finest, may be had as low as 55 or 65 cents a yard, and these are not merely in the tawdry unsalable colors—bright blue, red, and green—but in the dark stylish brown, indigo, blue-gray, myrtle, and chestnut. There are also English serges, with characteristic diagonal lines in the present fashion, sold for 50 cents a yard. These goods are three-fourths of a yard wide, too closely woven to fray in the seams, and though rather harsh to the touch, are not mixed with cotton. Navy blue is the favorite color for serge. Satines of the best quality imported are also reduced to half a dollar a yard. These are in choice dark shades, with the fine soft finish of French goods, and make pretty dressy suits for girls, though they lose their lustre if subjected to hard usage. Reversed-striped serges of fine flexible texture, formerly sold for 90 cents or $1 a yard, are now shown at 65 cents in rich camel's-hair shades. These are single width, measuring nearly seven-eighths of a yard. An excellent imitation of vigogne, with its heavy twill, rough surface, and natural gray and brown shades, is sold in single width for 50 cents a yard. This material has a slight mixture of cotton, but it drapes softly, and will make very warm and stylish-looking polonaises to be worn over black or brown skirts. For those who prefer lustrous stuffs there are richly repped épingelines, wool ground with silk face, reduced to 75 cents a yard, which is but half their former price. Poplins and all heavily ribbed goods are exceedingly low, partly because they are not as stylish as twilled materials.

GIRLS' DRESSES.

The designs used for making ladies' dresses are simplified and repeated for misses and children. The long polonaise of simple shape, with one dart and a belt, is the accepted over dress for girls over ten years; jockey basques, double or single breasted, and apron over-skirts jauntily draped are also seen, especially on slender, tall, overgrown girls. There is a fancy for dispensing with over-skirts for chubby little girls under ten years, making merely a sailor blouse, or else a basque, and trimmed skirt. Dress skirts for winter are comfortably long, and show only an inch or two of stocking above the high boot. White is still fashionable winter wear for small girls, but it is not as rigorously adhered to since the introduction of the sailor suits two years ago. The latter are still stylishly worn, are made in dark blue, black, gray, and in polka-dotted stuffs, and have an air of warmth and comfort that is never seen in white suits, no matter how heavy the wraps and under-clothing are. Black merino sailor suits have scarlet merino square collars, cuffs, pockets, sash, and bias bands on the skirt, piped with white braid. Indigo blue flannel suits have black yak braid trimmings, or else pale blue cashmere, or perhaps white woolen braid is used, and sometimes scarlet accessories brighten up these dark black-blue dresses. For tiny little girls red or blue cashmeres with white polka dots are used, and bordered with white bands, making a simple and pretty dress so gay and bright that it pleases the eye, although the caprice just now is to dress children in the sombre shades in vogue for ladies. Some new sailor suits prepared for girls from ten to fourteen years old have over-skirts added to the sailor blouses. The loose blouses are especially suitable to slight, undeveloped figures of growing girls, and the broad sailor collar is also appropriate. These suits are made of dark blue Middlesex sacking, such as is sold for $2 a yard, are trimmed with black braid, and cost from $16 to $18.

ENGLISH WALKING SUITS, ETC.

The new English walking suits already rival sailor suits for girls from eight to fourteen years old. They are made of gray or dark blue ladies' cloth; those of gray are trimmed with blue, and vice versa. For instance, the gray skirt has two light blue bias bands around it, the short round over-skirt is edged with a blue fold, and the pretty little English basque, with double postilion pleating behind has blue revers in front, is fastened by but one button, and slopes away to show a blue vest underneath, that is put on separately, and buttoned up warm and close to the throat. The suit, ready-made at the furnishing houses, costs from $11 to $20 for its various sizes.

For girls from three to eight years are simpler dresses, with full pleated waist fastened behind, a gored skirt, and a round over-skirt opening in front. With this dress a round cape is added for street wear, and the effect is of a warm walking coat. A pretty model in gray French merino, trimmed with a puff piped with silk and fringe, costs $18. For every-day dresses, light qualities of Melton and water-proof are used. The Gabrielle front is retained for these, while the sides and back extend over the hips, forming a jaunty little basque. These are in dark gray and brown shades, brightened by colored braids put on in leaf designs, scallops, and flounces. The dresses cost from $4 50 to $7 50, according to size.

Suits of satine, of dark stylish colors, are made for girls in their teens, and sold for $18. The graceful redingote is edged with a bias fold, and the skirt has kilt pleatings headed by folds. More expensive and showy dresses are made of the colored American silks, and sold for $30 or $40. Blacks suits are also greatly in favor with these young girls, but are no longer worn from motives of economy, as black goods show far less reduction in price than colored ones.

WRAPS.

English walking jackets of diagonal cloth, with silk or velvet facings, are the wraps most worn by girls from three years old up to young ladies. Those of dark blue cloth with silver or gilt buttons cost $9 50 for the smallest sizes. For warm bright days long sacques of white cloth with a colored stripe are used; the edges are scalloped and bound with silk like the stripe. Cashmere walking coats with ample capes are trimmed with milliners' folds and fringe, and cost from $10 upward, in gray, brown, or white. For cold wintry days black, brown, or dark blue velvet sacques are worn almost as long as the white dress beneath; scarlet or blue merino stockings, or else velvet leggings, give the limbs sufficient warmth, and brighten the costume. Seal-skin jackets are ordered for the larger girls of wealthy families. Gray cony is the fancy for fur sacques for little girls: $14 is the price. White cony sacques are $8, and the Normandy turban to match is $2. Felt hats of fine quality are the fashion of the winter for young girls. They have half-high crowns, with brims bent in capricious shape to suit the face of the wearer. They are placed quite back on the head, the hair is waved loosely in front, and worn in long hanging loops instead of one long Marguerite braid.

INFANTS' CLOTHING.

Infants' dresses are still made with high yokes and long sleeves. Their skirts are very long, sometimes measuring a yard and three-eighths from the neck down; this seems extravagant, but is done with economical intentions, as the skirt is then long enough to make two short skirts for the child when it is put into short clothes. Soft nansook is the material used. The pointed yokes are made up of lengthwise tucks, insertion, and puffs, while the skirts have horizontal trimmings. Pretty little day slips, with tucked yoke and a sash of the muslin, are sold for $4 50. Night slips of Jones's cambric are sacque-shaped, with a hemmed sash, and are trimmed with Coventry ruffles around the neck and wrists: price $2 25. Cloaks are long double capes of cashmere embroidered. White and pearl gray are the favorites. Close caps of lace with silk lining are worn on the head. Infants' outfits at the furnishing houses are shown at a larger range of prices than formerly. Those at $65 or $70 contain a variety of well-made garments, though not very liberal in numbers. They have also a basket, cap, and rubber articles. Hanging baskets are new for infants' toilettes, and are shown at extravagant prices. Pretty oval baskets, with dainty covers, are $5 50, while those with silk linings, covered with Swiss muslin and lace, are from $11 to $18. Half-long clothes for infants when first put into short clothes are merely their yoke slips shortened, and are made still shorter by tucking when the child is learning to walk.

BOYS' CLOTHING.

English styles are affected for boys' clothing. Entire suits for boys from ten to fifteen years old are made of small checked cloths and almost invisible plaids. The Derby single-breasted or else double-breasted sacks are used with wide English backs and demi-long tails. Boys from seven to ten years old wear dark blue suits, with perfectly plain English sack, vest, and pantaloons. These cost ready-made from $22 to $24 a suit. Smaller boys wear sacks more fancifully slashed, or else cut out in squares, and ornamented with some simple but effective braiding; their little vests have collars, and their knee-pantaloons are buttoned around the limb. Very plain cassimere suits for every-day wear cost from $10 to $12. Chinchilla and fur beavers are chosen for overcoats. Their rough surfaces are considered stylish, and make warmer-looking coats than smooth cloths. They are long single-breasted sacks, with fly fronts, and shaped to the figure. Colored stockings, gartered above the knee, are worn by little fellows with knee-trowsers. Felt hats in Alpine shape, with upturned brim, are shown in finest quality for boys: price $3.

ITEMS FOR LADIES.

Châtelaines of finely cut steel in artistic Renaissance designs are worn pendent from the side. They cost from $3 to $6 each. Short arrows of jet, mounted with cut steel that glitters like diamonds, are very much admired on bonnets, hats, in the coiffure, and for fastening veils or shawls: price from $1 25 to $2. Among other stylish ornaments are the expensive smoked pearl slides, large, oval or square, and made of solid pearl instead of having merely a veneering of it: they cost from $3 75 to $5 each. Large smoked pearl buttons for redingotes and jackets cost $4 a dozen.

FLAT SASHES.

Sashes of plain gros grain, watered, and velvet ribbon are worn very long and flat, without bouffant loops. The sash ribbon, two yards and a half long, is doubled in the middle and strung over the belt, leaving one long flat loop and two streamers; it is placed immediately in the middle of the back, or else slightly on the left. Sashes of the dress material have square ends, and sometimes pocket flaps are placed upon them. Black velvet sashes have pockets of lace or of jet beads in net-work of trellis pattern.

BEADED NET.

Among the elegant novelties of the winter are sleeveless jackets and over-skirts made of black figured net glistening with jet beads. Sometimes Spanish net with its large leaves is used, and sometimes Brussels net. The garment is edged with beaded lace. These together make a beautiful over dress for simple black dinner dresses, and are also worn with rich colored brocades, such as pale blue, rose, and lavender. A jacket and long apron cost $100.

For information received thanks are due to Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; BROOKS BROTHERS; and MILLER & GRANT.

PERSONAL.

MISS CAROLINE TALMAN, of this city, has erected, as a memorial of her parents, a beautiful church at Madison Avenue and Eighty-ninth Street, which was consecrated a few days since by Bishop POTTER as the Church of the Beloved Disciple. The cost of the edifice was $100,000. A statue of St. JOHN occupies a niche over the entrance door. The windows, of beautifully stained glass, are dedicated to the memory of the relatives of the donor. The chancel window is a particularly beautiful work of art, having on either side highly finished fresco paintings representing scenes in the life of our Saviour. Two marble tablets bear the name of the parents of Miss TALMAN. The organ, font, and the entire finishing of the church are of the finest material and in perfect taste.

—The LINDSEYS, the WILLETS, and the HAVENSES had a memorable meeting the other day in Mansfield, Ohio. It was the occasion of their silver wedding, the three couples having been married on the same day, and taken their bridal tour together. It was then understood that if living at the expiration of twenty-five years they would meet and celebrate their silver nuptials. Each couple has the same number of children, and there is but one ge-irl in the whole number.

—In a late Number of the Bazar allusion was made to the new prima donna discovered by and brought out in Paris under the direction of MAURICE STRAKOSCH. It now transpires that the young artiste, Mlle. BELOCCA, belongs to one of the best families in Russia, that her father is one of the most distinguished savants in the empire, and enjoys an income of over 100,000 francs a year.

—In history we find hundreds of men celebrated for their victories—among them ALEXANDER, PHILIP, CÆSAR, HANNIBAL, POMPEY, ANTHONY, PYRRHUS, SYLLA, SELEUCUS, NAPOLEON. But it should be remembered that each of these was governed by ambition, not patriotism—personal aggrandizement, not the good of the people. What were their rewards? ALEXANDER and HANNIBAL, a cup of poison; ANTHONY, suicide; PYRRHUS, killed by a brick thrown by a Spartan woman; SYLLA, killed by vermin; PHILIP, CÆSAR, POMPEY, and SELEUCUS were assassinated; NAPOLEON, exiled and died at St. Helena; NAPOLEON III., exiled and died at Chiselhurst.

—The following kings and queens have been corporally chastised while reigning sovereigns: HENRY VI., by the Earl of Warwick and by ALICE BOTELER; JAMES I., by BUCHANAN; LOUIS XIII., by his tutor by order of his mother, MARIE DE MEDICI; CHRISTINA of Sweden, by her mother, for stealing rose-water; ATHALARIC, King of the Ostrogoths, and CONSTANTINE, by their mothers; JOSEPH I., when King of the Romans; and the King of Rome, by Madame MONTESQUIEU.

—Concerning memory: it is doubtful if there ever lived a man who possessed that quality in so remarkable a degree as the historian NIEBUHR. When only twelve years of age he astonished all by his knowledge of history, statistics, and geography. He acquired twenty languages. His memory never gave up what he had once made his own. His wife and sister tried him in GIBBON, and questioned him, according to the index, on the most trivial points; but they soon gave up the hope of finding him ignorant of any point of history, however unimportant. Yet, with all his learning, he delighted in lively and witty conversation, and in the joyous games of children.

—THOMAS MILLER, the self-educated author, once famed as "The Basket-weaving Poet," after forty years of hard labor, is said to have been brought to extreme want. A long illness has deprived him of pecuniary support, and he is therefore very badly off indeed. The London papers are taking up the matter with great spirit, and will doubtless succeed in placing the good old gentleman in circumstances of comparative comfort.

—In the "Prudential" insurance office, London, the experiment of employing female clerks has been tried with complete success. Beginning with ten, the number has increased to thirty-six, and more are to be added. The apartments in which they are occupied are apart from those of the male clerks. They are ladies of education and good families, being exclusively the daughters of professional men, and their ages vary from eighteen to thirty-five. They reach the office at 10 A.M., stop work for an hour at 1 P.M., and leave at 5 P.M. Several holidays in the year are allowed. The work is chiefly a simple kind of copying, requiring attention, good handwriting, and intelligence. The salaries are not very large, beginning at $150 per annum, and raised $50 each year up to $300. A lady superintendent has exclusive supervision of the department, and their work is as well done as that of the male clerks.

—The briefest and probably best description of the personal appearance of Queen ELIZABETH ever printed was written by a German traveler, HENTZNER, who saw her at Greenwich on a Sunday as she was entering church: "She was said (rumor erat) to be fifty-five years old. Her face was rather long, white, and somewhat wrinkled; her eyes small, black, and gracious; her nose somewhat bent; her lips compressed; her teeth black (from eating too much sugar). She had ear-rings of pearl, red hair, but artificial, and wore a small crown. Her breast was uncovered (as is the case with all unmarried ladies in England), and round her neck was a chain with precious gems. Her hands were graceful, her fingers long. She was of middle size, but stepped on majestically. She was gracious and kind in her address. The dress she wore was of white silk, with pearls as large as beans. Her cloak was of black silk, with silver lace, and a long train was carried by a marchioness. As she walked along she spoke most kindly with many people, some of them embassadors. She spoke English, French, and Italian; but she knows also Greek and Latin, and understands Spanish, Scotch, and Dutch. When she came to the door of the chapel, books were handed to her, and the people called out, 'God save the Queen ELIZABETH!' whereupon the queen answered, 'I thanke you, myn good peupel.' Prayers did not last more than half an hour, and the music was excellent."

—Prince HASSAN, third son of the Khedive of Egypt, educated at Oxford, where he graduated recently, receiving the honorary degree of D.C.L., is at Berlin, pursuing his military studies. He has received a lieutenant's commission in the Prussian artillery.

—Since King VICTOR EMANUEL left Berlin all sorts of stories are current at the court and the embassies about his sayings and doings while in the German capital. He took every opportunity of expressing his admiration for the German nation and its military triumphs, but manifested great coldness toward France. "I come here," he said to a Prussian statesman, "to greet my ally, who has always been faithful to me, and to see an enlightened country which has done such great things;" and then turning to Prince de Polignac, the French military attaché, he added, "Je suis venu parce que la France m'y a forcé." Every one was struck by his chilly demeanor toward the French representatives, especially as it was in such remarkable contrast to the conduct of Prince HUMBERT last year, who assured a French officer that Italy continues to entertain toward France "les sympathies les plus vives." It was also much remarked that during the king's stay the French embassador, M. CONTAUT-BIRON, was not at Berlin, although he was expected some weeks back. The second secretary of the embassy, M. DEMAINS, having remarked to the king that the embassador was ill, VICTOR EMANUEL asked in an incredulous tone if he was very ill, as he (the king) would have been glad to see him, and, speaking of the present position of France, he said: "Vous n'avez point d'ennemis. Consentez seulement à rester tranquilles chez vous, et renoncez à vous mêler aux affaires des autres." As to the diplomatic pourparlers between Austria and Italy, Signor VISCONTI-VENOSTA is said to have remarked, "Nous n'avons rien fait avec les Autrichiens, il n'y a rien à faire avec ces gens-là." At Berlin, too, Signor MINGHETTI endeavored to obtain something more tangible than mere assurances of friendship, but Prince BISMARCK curtly replied, "Il ne s'agit nullement d'une convention écrite, et il ne faut pas y songer."

—Mr. DION BOUCICAULT appears in the Tribune as a critic of the correspondent of that journal's criticism on HENRY WATTERSON'S racy letter on the London Times. Mr. BOUCICAULT says that "the stateliness of the Times is mistaken for respectability, its selfishness for self-esteem, and it maintains an unstained reputation on demeanor alone," and much more of the same racy sort. Coming to himself, Mr. BOUCICAULT says: "When I entered the world of letters as a dramatist thirty-two years ago, I found my fellow-authors in the condition described in Gil Blas, living on the pittance doled out to them by the managers of theatres, who drank their wine, like the warriors of Odin, out of the skulls of their victims—the dramatic authors. I received just £300 sterling for my comedy, London Assurance—Mr. FARRAN, an actor, received £3000 a year for playing in it. DOUGLAS JERROLD received £100 for Black-Eyed Susan—Mr. J. P. COOKE, who played in it, made £60,000 out of his performances. SHERIDAN KNOWLES received, I believe, £400 for William Tell, and BULWER received £500 for his comedy, Money—Mr. MACREADY was paid £120 a week for playing in these plays. It appeared to me that the literary element ought to be placed on an equal footing with the artistic, and I set myself the task of raising my profession to the only standard which the English mind applies to every thing—the standard of money. My plan was this: I waited and watched the London managers until one of them found himself on the verge of ruin (I did not wait long); then I offered him a play on condition of receiving one-half the profits. His poverty, not his will, consented to these terms, and I realized £8000 for my share. This innovation aroused at once the concerted opposition of the managers and the press: a literary man had burst his bonds as a slave of the pen; he had become his own publisher; he was no longer a beast of burden; he had eaten of the tree of knowledge. I engaged a company of comedians, and sent my drama into the provincial towns, placing the name of the drama in big letters at the head of the bill, precisely as the name of a great star actor is generally announced. I made £10,000 by that operation, and broke down the so-called 'star' system."

—When Dr. NÉLATON began his studies he worked with such ardor that he often refused himself the time necessary for sleep. He procured a plank some five to six feet long and forty centimeters broad, the extremities of which he placed on two chairs. He lay upon it, holding his book open above him. It is said that in this position the want of sleep is less readily felt. When, in spite of him, his eyes closed and the book fell, the shock disturbed his balance, and he followed the book. The shock aroused him, and he got up and began his work again. NÉLATON'S son, CHARLES, now twenty-three years old, had not selected any career when the war broke out in 1870; but after the siege of Paris the vocation of the young man for the medical profession was irrevocably fixed, and he began the regular career of the young sawbones.

—EUGÈNE SCRIBE'S widow still lives, at the age of seventy. Her husband left her a large fortune, the result of his funny brain, worked off in farces and such for the amusement of Paris.

—Concerning the health of Professor AGASSIZ, he recently stated to a friend, "I am weak and unable to accomplish the amount of work which demands my attention. My powers often fail me when I have most need of them."

Hosted by Google

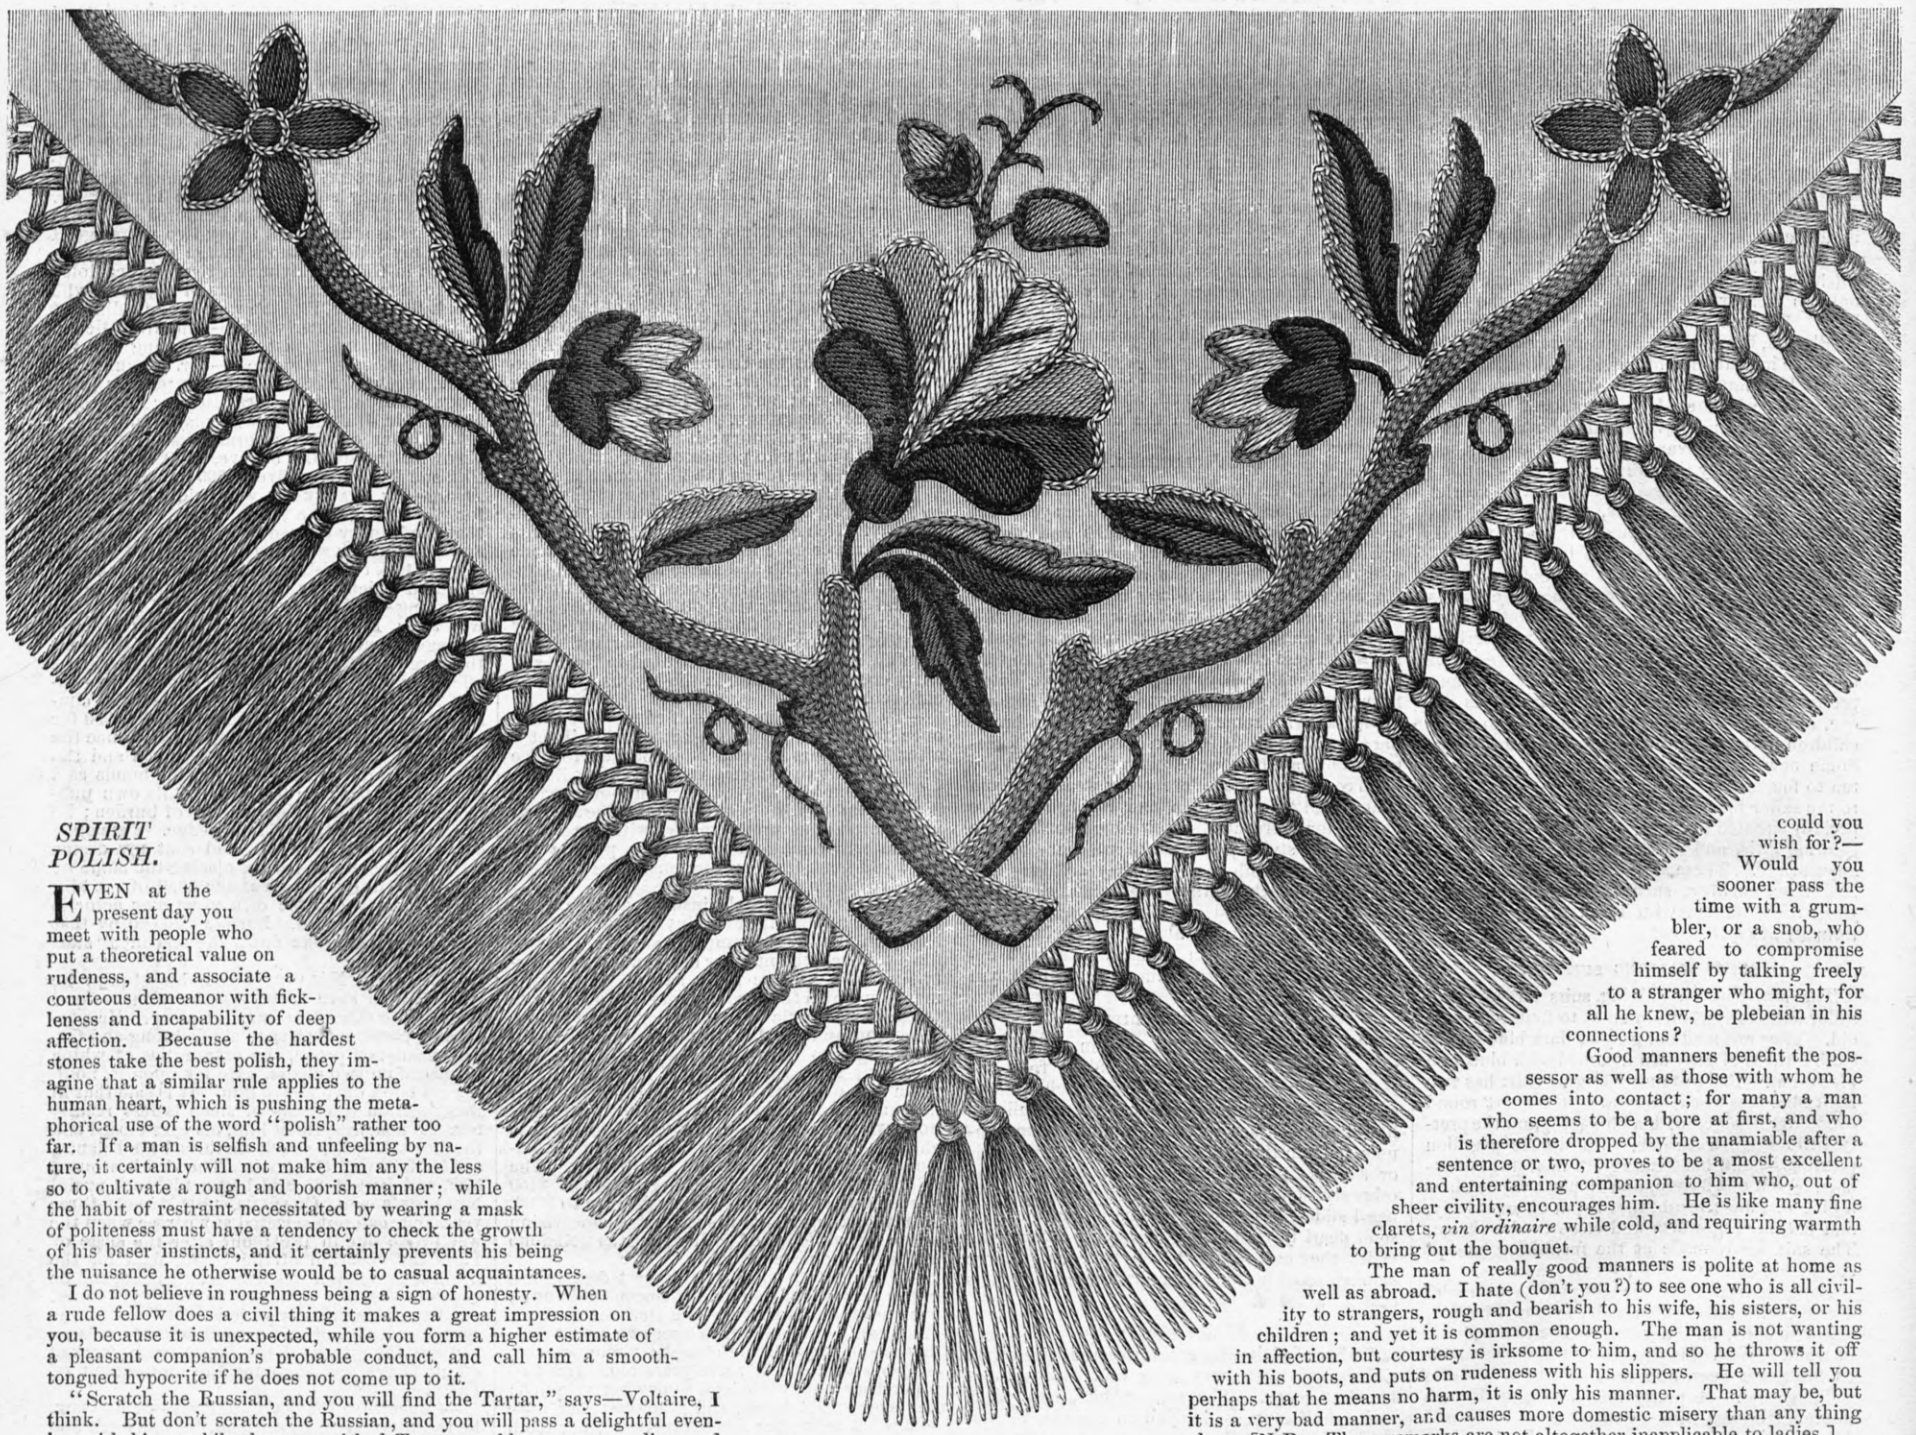
Quarter Section of Tidy.—Chain and Satin Stitch Embroidery.

THE illustration shows a quarter section of a tidy, which is worked on gray drilling in chain and satin stitch embroidery with split zephyr worsted in the natural colors of the flowers and leaves. The outer edge of the tidy is bordered with knotted fringe. This may also be used for a stand cover, and may be of any size desired. It is very easily made, and is pretty and effective. Cloth or reps may be used for the foundation instead of drilling, if preferred.

THREE-CORNERED KNITTED SHAWL, WORN AS A FICHU.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 33.

BLACK VELVET ROUND HAT.
For description see Supplement.

THREE-CORNERED KNITTED SHAWL, WORN AS A HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 33.



QUARTER SECTION OF TIDY.—CHAIN AND SATIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

SPIRIT POLISH.

EVEN at the present day you meet with people who put a theoretical value on rudeness, and associate a courteous demeanor with fickleness and incapability of deep affection. Because the hardest stones take the best polish, they imagine that a similar rule applies to the human heart, which is pushing the metaphorical use of the word "polish" rather too far. If a man is selfish and unfeeling by nature, it certainly will not make him any the less so to cultivate a rough and boorish manner; while the habit of restraint necessitated by wearing a mask of politeness must have a tendency to check the growth of his baser instincts, and it certainly prevents his being the nuisance he otherwise would be to casual acquaintances.

I do not believe in roughness being a sign of honesty. When a rude fellow does a civil thing it makes a great impression on you, because it is unexpected, while you form a higher estimate of a pleasant companion's probable conduct, and call him a smooth-tongued hypocrite if he does not come up to it.

"Scratch the Russian, and you will find the Tartar," says—Voltaire, I think. But don't scratch the Russian, and you will pass a delightful evening with him; while the unvarnished Tartar would eat your candles, and pistol you if you objected. Give me the Russian.

I own that I esteem the growth of politeness between man and man to be the greatest advantage of the age we live in. I could do very well without railways, steamboats, or electric telegraphs, but to have people always treading on my moral corns would make life odious. I do not believe in bluntness; the proper thing to be done with a rough diamond, in my estimation, is to cut it.

I grant that the desire to make himself agreeable will occasionally betray a man into rash offers of service, which he afterward finds it inconvenient or impossible to fulfill. Irishmen, in particular, are subject to this generous impetuosity, which sometimes leads the cooler Englishman or Scotchman to tax them with insincerity. But this is a harsh and unjust judgment. When the Hibernian gentleman with whom you fraternize in a railway carriage, or on a Swiss mountain, offers to board, lodge, and mount you during the next hunting season, if you will look him up at his little place in Galway, he is not humbugging you; he is speaking recklessly, perhaps, but the impulse which causes him to do so is generous. If you accepted his invitation, indeed, he would probably recollect neither it nor you; and as for doing all he promised, the chances are that it would not be in his power, though he would certainly try his best. But who in his senses ever accepts general invitations? You have spent a happy day with a pleasant companion, who has set you at ease with yourself by appreciating your society, and whose polite regret to part from you has been expressed in the form of an invitation to renew the acquaintanceship. What more could you wish for?—Would you sooner pass the time with a grumbler, or a snob, who feared to compromise himself by talking freely to a stranger who might, for all he knew, be plebeian in his connections?

Good manners benefit the possessor as well as those with whom he comes into contact; for many a man who seems to be a bore at first, and who is therefore dropped by the unamiable after a sentence or two, proves to be a most excellent and entertaining companion to him who, out of sheer civility, encourages him. He is like many fine clarets, vin ordinaire while cold, and requiring warmth to bring out the bouquet.

The man of really good manners is polite at home as well as abroad. I hate (don't you?) to see one who is all civility to strangers, rough and bearish to his wife, his sisters, or his children; and yet it is common enough. The man is not wanting in affection, but courtesy is irksome to him, and so he throws it off with his boots, and puts on rudeness with his slippers. He will tell you perhaps that he means no harm, it is only his manner. That may be, but it is a very bad manner, and causes more domestic misery than any thing else. [N.B.—These remarks are not altogether inapplicable to ladies.]

Another real test of good manners is the ability to retain the polish at times of peril, anger, or excitement. There is a story told of Spanish politeness which may probably not be familiar. When the ruins of Lisbon were cleared after the famous earthquake, the skeletons of two dons were discovered in a doorway, hat in hand, and bowing to one another. They had evidently meditated escape from the house on the first shock, had met in the passage, and each being too polite to pass out before the other, they had perished together.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—TAPESTRY RUG.—ONE-EIGHTH OF FULL SIZE.—[See Fig. 2, Page 777.]—For design and description see Supplement (Embroidery Page), Nos. 1-4.

But of all the anecdotes in illustration of my subject which I could produce, were readers more patient, that which charms me most is a French one. A citizen of that polished country had unfortunately done something which necessitated his being hanged, and as there was no professional executioner available for the occasion, the painful duty of carrying out the sentence devolved upon an amateur, who apologized for any possible short-comings to the person principally concerned.

"I hope you will pardon me," said he, "if I put you to any unnecessary inconvenience, but the fact is I have never hanged any one before."

"Pray do not mention it," replied the other; "for that matter, I have never been hanged before. We must each do our best."

LUNCHEON.

IT does not do to go without lunch altogether, and it is equally deleterious to the system to make a large meal in the middle of the day. The ordinary and healthy lunch should be light, nutritious, and, if possible, should be taken in a perpendicular position. It is difficult to suggest any accurate regulations as to substance, for variety is undoubtedly of great importance, and the human stomach is an intensely delicate and sensitive organ. I can confidently recommend a plate of strong, clear soup. A dozen and a half of oysters, when in season, form perhaps the best luncheon that can be suggested. Bread, cheese, and butter, so long as they are very moderately indulged in, I have no objection to whatever. Any thing in the nature of a sandwich should be sedulously avoided. Scotch oatcake can be made of eminent service at one o'clock, but I am disposed to think that biscuits are a mistake. A broiled sole with clarified butter, or the deviled leg of a chicken, are not, on the whole, of too substantial an order. Light articles of this description readily suggest themselves, but never, never, NEVER eat a beefsteak for lunch!

(Continued from No. 47, page 743.)

THROUGH FIRE AND WATER.

A Tale of City Life.

BY FREDERICK TALBOT,

AUTHOR OF "THE WINNING HAZARD," "JACK PUGH'S LEGACY," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

"For look you, Sir, you know not which way you shall go."

"I'M glad I've seen you before I went in," said John, beginning hurriedly to speak before Edward could arrange his ideas, and while he was yet hesitating to encounter the cruel task before him. "I'm glad I've seen you; because it's probable I may save a very painful scene—a scene that would be very painful to me, I assure you; yes, indeed, very painful. I assure you I will feel it very much." Here John's face assumed an expression of extreme sensibility and self-compassion.

"What do you mean?" cried Edward, hoarsely.

"Well, my dear Sir, I've been thinking very painfully over the matter—prayerfully too, I might say," said John, throwing a rapid glance at Edward to see how he took it; "and I have, very reluctantly indeed—in fact, with great violence to my own feelings (being, as you know, a man of very tender feelings)—but I have come to the conclusion, reluctantly, as you may know—"

"Well," said Edward, looking in a dazed way at his face. "Well?"

"That it won't do. My engagement with your sister must be broken off. I don't know how I shall bear it, indeed, for I was very deeply attached to her—very. A most excellent young woman, and calculated to make any one happy and comfortable in the highest degree. I can't tell you how I feel the disappointment; but there are considerations higher than those of mere earthly affection: there's the duty I owe my parents and—and my godfather. All my prospects in life depend upon them, all my chance of the living of Pumptrisaint, besides the legacy I'm sure to have. Now, Edward, as a dutiful son, I ask you, how can I go against that?"

"You told us your father approved," said Edward, in a faint voice. He realized the situation now. Heavens! was this the man at whose feet they must crawl, whose mercy and forbearance they were bound to implore?

"So he had, in a way. I hadn't given him all the particulars, and perhaps I wasn't explicit enough as to your position, and so on. But when my father and my godfather—Sir Pantlin Jones, you know, baronet and member of Parliament—when they came to see the house you lived in, and all that; and really it hadn't struck me, but when I come to look at it I see that it would be a descent now, wouldn't it, from Sir Pantlin Jones of Pumptrisaint to Hulse of Ebbsfleet Wharf? Well, I told them your father was a wharfinger, but it seems that the drain-pipes upset my godfather. I begged of them to see Lucy, who is such a sweet girl that they couldn't help being pleased with her. But it was no use. He's so impatient, is Sir Pantlin. 'John,' he said to me, 'by ——, if you marry a bricklayer's daughter, I'll disown you forever.'"

"Oh, he said that, did he?" cried Edward, white with suppressed passion, his sense of helplessness and powerlessness making his rage glow all the more fiercely. "And what did you say?"

"What could I say, my dear fellow? I did try to explain that they were pipes and tiles, and not bricks, that your father dealt in, and that very respectable people sold such things in London; but it was not a morsel of good."

"Then you mean to say—"

"I want you to take this letter to your sister. Break it to her as gently as you can, my dear fellow, for I dare say she'll feel it as much as I do. Only give her to understand that this is final, and ask her to pity me."

"Pity you, you infernal scoundrel!"

"What!" shouted John.

"You lying, cozening scoundrel!"

The word roused all the fiery blood of the Welshman. With the back of his hand he smote Edward in the mouth, and in a moment his lips were streaked with blood. With the rapidity of lightning Edward returned the buffet with a left-handed blow, delivered so straight and true that, as Jones threw back his head to avoid it, it fell upon him just under the right ear, so that he dropped heavily to the ground.

The candle had fallen over in the scuffle; all was silent after the first crash of the fall of the man, and all was dark.

"John!" cried Edward, in alarm. "John, have I hurt you? where are you? what are you doing? Speak to me; for Heaven's sake, speak!"

There wasn't a word in reply. Not a sound to be heard, except the howling and scratching of the big dog up stairs.

"John! John!" said Edward, stooping over him, and taking hold of his arm, "what have I done to you?"

The arm dropped down limp and flaccid. There was no flutter of breath or whisper of life in the body lying there. With trembling haste Edward felt for the match-box, and tried to strike a light. The match flared, sputtered, went out. His hands were wet with some viscid fluid; he couldn't wipe it off. He got a light at last. The feeble flame of the candle disclosed the body of Jones lying prone and lifeless; its head rested in a small pool of blood. The head had struck against the triangular edge of the iron vise. It was impossible that the life should have gone out of a strong man's body on such small provocation. It was a swoon he was in; he would recover presently. But it was awful, too, to see the stillness of the body. There was a tremulous flutter of the nether lip for a moment—was it the sign of returning life? No; rather the last struggle of expiring nature. For after that the features took a terribly set and rigid look, the expression that only the master Death can limn.

Edward held his face between his hands. What was this gulf that had opened beneath his feet, that had cut him off in a moment from all the hopes and desires of life? Had this curse, then, indeed descended upon him, this fatal, irrevocable curse? No, it was an evil dream, a vision. But there was blood upon his hands—blood!

"Edward," cried a sweet, soft voice, the voice of his sister calling to him from afar, "are you there? Where is John?"

"I don't know."

Between all his past life, bright and honorable, and the dark, dismal future awaiting him, there was now this invisible barrier, these words, the words of the unhappy prototype of all blood-stained men—"I know not."

CHAPTER IX.

"Pless my soul! how full of cholers I am, and trempling of mind!"

THE Reverend John Jones had occupied lodgings, during the time he had been in charge of the parish of St. Saveall's, in Finsbury Circus, a locality, be it said, much more airy and cheerful than Pimlico. It need hardly be remarked that the mistress of the house was a Welshwoman. Her husband was a little atomy of a man, who was agent to some slate company in North Wales. She herself was a buxom woman, clever, tidy, and very clean. She was really glad to have as a lodger the son of the archdeacon. She was not a churchwoman herself; she attended a Welsh chapel, whence was served a distillation of all the strong faiths in which her countrymen delight; nevertheless she respected much the dignitaries of the Establishment. Little Evan Morris, her husband, was a shocking radical—would have people vote against their landlords, and generally fly in the face of their bread-and-butter; but Gwen was a careful, prudent woman, who looked forward to returning to Pumptrisaint some day, and despised such vagaries.

The archdeacon was a tall, bony man, who always wore an ample black frock, which seemed glossy enough in Wales, but, somehow or other, looked rather dusty in London—a broad-brimmed hat, about which was a perpetual black band, also harboring the dust. He had a brown weather-beaten face, dark vague eyes; a pleasant smile was generally hovering about his mouth. Sir Pantlin Jones showed a seamed but fresh-looking apple face, wore always a gray suit and a blue bird's-eye neck-tie, limped a little in his gait, and swore sonorously.

"De-ear, it's the archdeacon and Sir Pantlin!" cried Mrs. Morris, as she opened the door. "Well, indeed, and who would have thought of seeing you? Come in, do!"

"We've come to breakfast with my son," cried the archdeacon, after he had shaken hands with Mrs. Morris. "We're not putting you out in any way, I hope?"

"Name o' goodness, no; but—" Here Mrs. Morris's face clouded over, and she fell into a state of great perplexity. "Come in, do, and sit down!" she cried at last, her face clearing for a moment as she led the way into the sitting-room. She carefully dusted the seats of two chairs with her apron, and left her guests to their own devices, while she proceeded to take counsel of her thoughts.

John Jones, her lodger, had not come home the night before. She didn't think much of that; he might have stopped out with some friends. Mrs. Morris knew the ways of young men too well to feel decided alarm. But his father—would he not be angry? And Mrs. Morris's first impulses, despite her careful ways, were always on the side opposed to law and authority. No, she thought, she had better send a note by special messenger to Ebbsfleet Wharf, saying that the Reverend John Jones's father had come to breakfast, and asking if he had been staying there for the night, or if Mr. Hulse knew where he was. It would not take ten minutes to run to Lower Bridge Street and back. In the mean time her lodger's friends must wait patiently.

This they did at first, looking at the engravings on the wall: a lithograph of Aberdovey Pier; a distempered view of the Bay of Naples, with the schooner Mary Ann, port of Aberystwith, Thomas Jones, master, 110 tons register, floating thereon in great pride; a small portrait of Parch. Evan Evans, a shining light of the Calvinist faith; and a large one of Sir Watkyns, his lady, his horse, and a few favorite hounds, which occupied a conspicuous post of honor over the fire-place. Sir Pantlin soon became impatient and rang the bell. Nobody answered it, and then he began to swear. The archdeacon pulled him up sharp.

"Do you remember in whose presence you are? Come, come, Sir Pantlin," he cried, "it may be all very well at Pumptrisaint, but it won't do in London."

"That reminds me," said Sir Pantlin, "of a story my grandfather used to tell.—God bless me, what's the matter?"

For here the door opened, and a young girl ran in, fair to see, but very white and eager-looking. She came up to his father (to John's father), and took him by the hand.

"You are John's father, I know. Oh, tell me where he is! Where did you leave him?"

"Why, he's here, of course; these are his rooms. Bless me, what—"

"Indeed he's not here, archdeacon; he didn't come home last night, and I sent to Mr. Hulse's to see if they knew where he was. This is Miss Hulse, cariad anwyl!" cried Mrs. Morris, appearing hot and flustered, her bonnet stuck upright on her head.

"How very unaccountable!" cried the archdeacon. "He left us in Piccadilly at eight o'clock last night, saying that he was going home, and asked us to breakfast with him at nine. What can be the matter? You say, young lady, that you have seen or heard nothing of him?"

"Only the bell!" cried Lucy; "only the bell! I heard his ring at the door, but there was nobody there, and from that moment I feared that something had happened." Lucy began to sob.

"I can't understand it," said the archdeacon, turning quite pale and flaccid. "What shall we do?"

"Stay, here is an open letter," cried Sir Pantlin, "lying on the table. Read it, Jones; it may throw light upon the affair."

The archdeacon took it up and read it. It was the letter advising Jones of the dishonor of the bill to which his name had been forged.

The father groaned heavily; for the moment he thought that all was explained—that his son, overwhelmed with embarrassments of which his father was ignorant, had either absconded or committed suicide; but, looking again at the letter, he saw that there was written across it in his son's untidy scrawl, "This is either a stupid hoax or a base forgery."

"I think," said the archdeacon, looking round wildly—"I think we'd better send for the police. Don't go, young lady; we shall require your assistance."

"Yes," cried Sir Pantlin. "Run, Mrs. Morris, give my compliments—Sir Pantlin's compliments—Sir Pantlin of Pumptrisaint, his compliments—to the nearest magistrate, and request that he will do me the favor to place the services of his most experienced detectives and active officers at my—at Sir Pantlin's—disposal. Do you hear, Mrs. Morris?"

"Oh yes!" cried Lucy; "he has come to some harm. Oh, do run for the police! I will go too; I will go and look for him."

They couldn't stop her. She ran out quickly.

CHAPTER X.

"Pity, you ancient stones, those tender babes."

AT nine o'clock on Monday morning, Edward Hulse issued from the postern-gate of Ebbsfleet Wharf. He looked pale and haggard, and cast an uneasy glance up and down the street as he went out. He turned eastward, and passed up a succession of narrow streets, in which the combined flavor of oranges, red-herrings, fresh and kippered fish, mingled with tarry ropy odors from the river hard by, and pushed his way through swarms of coster-mongers, crowds of porters and loafers, threading in and out among drays and lorries, whose heavy horses made the pavements ring with the resonance of their iron hoofs. Passing through all this noise and confusion, he came to a quiet triangular space, round which were ranged, in a hollow crescent, numberless carts and vans, waiting for their morning loads.

Before him crouched the grim gray walls of the Tower, about whose battlements and bastions the light gray mists of the morning still lingered. The flag of England drooped half-way down on the staff, betokening the death of one of her most veteran and gallant soldiers, while visible here and there, between the crenelations of the walls, the scarlet-glowing coat, the black bear-skin, the glinting bayonet of the sentry, caught the cheery morning beams of the sun, as he struggled forth from his encompassing vapors.

Around the dry and arid fosse of the Tower is a little belt of shrubbery and grass. To this the entrance is by a wooden wicket, which the inhabitants of the neighboring square are allowed to use. Edward passed unchallenged into this inclosure. The meagre shrubs, whose leaves, even now, were dropping rattling to the ground at each breath of wind, afforded only a scanty screen. Nevertheless, this had been before now the trysting-place of Edward and Patty, and here he had been summoned to meet her at nine o'clock this Monday morning.

"I thought you were in Margate, Patty, till I got your note just now."

Edward spoke in dreary, mechanical tones: his soul was away. He might move hither and thither, his mind rested always in the narrow inclosure of Ebbsfleet Wharf. Patty, in a moment, noticed his gloom.

"You are not well, Edward?" she said. "What is the matter?"

"Oh, I'm pretty well," he replied, with a forced laugh—"that is, I'm a little seedy, that's all."

"The reason I asked you to meet me," said Patty, with dignity—her pride had taken alarm at Edward's coldness—"the reason I asked you to meet me here was to put you on your guard."

"Against what?" said Edward, with a start.

"Against Bilfil. He is your enemy, and I am afraid he has some hold over you."

Edward ground his teeth.

"And pray how do you know any thing about Bilfil?" he cried, angrily.

Patty smiled; she didn't mind his anger.

"I met him at Margate, and I had a long walk with him yesterday morning. Indeed, he made me an offer, Ned, and I refused it."

"He, Bilfil, offered you marriage!" cried Edward.

Patty nodded, and went on:

"I refused him, and then he asked about you; and then, of course, I told him all about it, and he said that you were a fool, and couldn't take care of yourself, much less of any body else—those were his very words, Ned; and—you mustn't be angry—that you would be in prison before long. And then I got warm, and called him a liar; and he laughed, and took out his pocket-book, and showed me a paper, a bill, with your name to it; and I couldn't believe my eyes, and then he shut up his book with a snap. 'Like that,' he cried, 'I will shut up your Master Edward!' Oh, Edward, the very click of that lock made me shudder. And I didn't lose a moment, but came back to London by the next train, and I went almost to your house, and I was going to knock at the door, and ask for you—I didn't like to, Ned; oh, I felt so wretched, Ned!—but at that moment I heard somebody coming along. It was quite dusk, so I stepped into the next lane, thinking, if it was you, I could see you without any fuss; and it wasn't you after all, but the curate of St. Saveall's; and then I waited, and saw him go in, and you come after him quickly, running, trying to overtake him, and I hadn't time to stop you."

Edward gave a groan. Oh, if she had only stopped him!

"I hadn't time to stop you, and finding you had a visitor, a friend, I didn't like to ask for you, Ned, and I waited some little time hoping he or you might come out; but he never came out, Ned."

Edward gave another involuntary groan.

"And then somebody spoke to me, some tipsy man, and I ran home as fast as I could, and sent you a note instead this morning. And now you really must be careful, Ned, and keep out of the way, for I think it would break my heart to see you in prison."

"Patty," said Ned, a sudden thought striking him, "are you as true as steel, as brave as a lion? Are you to be trusted with a life?"

"Try me!" cried Patty, with a curl of the lip and a flash of the eye.

They whispered together long; and when they had finished, Patty's face was as pale as Edward's. Then they clasped hands for a moment, and went their ways.

Edward sent a note to Paston and Brett that morning, saying that he wasn't well, and would take his holiday a week sooner than he had intended; and having dispatched that by the office-boy, he went into the yard, lit a pipe, and awaited events. His sister was out; had gone out without leaving any message. This disquieted him. Where could she be? A man had called and inquired for him. Who could he be? A detective, perhaps—hardly. Swift as retribution might be, there would surely be a little respite, an hour or two of liberty, a little gleam of this bright autumn sunshine, ere the chillness and blackness of night succeeds.

There was a ring at the bell—a short, quick ring. Edward went to the gate. A respectable-looking man stood there.

"Mr. Edward Hulse in?" he said.

"I am Edward Hulse."

"Oh, then can I have a word with you?"

"Certainly. Come in."

He ushered the man into the yard.

"I have a paper here for you," the man whispered—"a writ. Suit of Bilfil. You know, I dare say."

"Yes, it's all right," said Edward; "there's nothing more to say, is there?"

"Oh no; all right. Good-day."

"Good-day."

"Victoria, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, to Edward Hulse of Ebbsfleet Wharf, in the County of the City of London, We warn you that, unless within twelve days after the service of this writ on you (inclusive of the day of such service), you obtain leave from one of the Judges of the Courts at Westminster to appear, and do within that time appear in our Court of Common Pleas, in an action at the suit of William Bilfil, the said William Bilfil may proceed therein to judgment and execution. Witness, Sir William Bellows, Knight, at Westminster, the sixth day of October, in the Year of our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Sixty-four."

He was sharp upon him, then, this Bilfil. No respite here. Ned had been a careful, prudent youth, nervously anxious for respectability and good opinion. At any other time this writ upon him would have caused him the keenest suffering; now he scarcely felt the slightest concern. Twelve days! twelve days! What will be the end of it? Where would they all be at the end of twelve days?

CHAPTER XI.

"Is there no pity sitting in the clouds
That sees into the bottom of my grief?"

IT was not long before the services of an experienced City detective were secured by the archdeacon. The name of Sir Pantlin Jones, Bart., M.P., did, it appeared, carry some little weight with it. The detective, a stout, heavy-looking man, of an unmistakably policeman's eye and jowl, who was known to his friends as Mr. Brass, asked a good many questions concerning the circumstances of John Jones's disappearance. But he didn't seem at all excited about the matter.

"Depend upon it, gents," he said, "he'll come back. As for the young lady being in it, bless her 'art, sweethearts are none so plenty that gals should go and knock 'em on the head."

"But you don't know—you haven't explained to the officer," said Sir Pantlin to the archdeacon, "what he had gone there to do."

"No," said the archdeacon, reluctantly; "I didn't want to say any thing about it. But the fact was, John, my son, was going to the house to break off the match at my command."

"And do you think," said Mr. Brass, reflectively, "that the young woman 'd 'a said any thing about the ring at the bell if she'd known where he'd been put to? Wasn't that nat'ral now? Fancying every ring at the bell was his—waiting to hear his footstep, bless her 'art, and he never come. No, depend upon it, gents, he's all right. His heart failed him jest at the last; he know'd he was going to break her 'art, poor dear, and he hadn't res'lootion to do it. He'll come back in a day or two; still, we'll keep our eyes open—yes, we'll keep our eyes open, gents."

"But you must do more than that, officer; remember he's my godson—Sir Pantlin Jones of Pumptrisaint; you seem to forget that—my godson, do you hear?"

"Then you ought to have kep him more up in his chatecum, Sir Pantlin, than what he were by all accounts. Now, the fac' is, gents, I know a leetle more about this bisness than you thinks, for I met a young party jest now whose face I recelected, and I found he'd jest come away from this here door, and by means of a little cross-questioning I finds out that this chap has a writ to serve on our young master. Well, I puts this and that together, and I comes to the conclusion that he's laid up somewhere: not very far, p'r'aps, if we only knew."

"Eh? Begad, archdeacon, I didn't think that of our boy; don't seem like him, eh? It must be a mistake. Like this, eh?" said Sir Pantlin, picking up the open lawyer's letter. "I'd better show the officer this letter, eh?"

The detective read the letter.

"It makes the thing only the stronger, gents. A writ to be served—a bill dishonored—that's a bit of flash in the pan about the forgery, depend upon it; his sweetheart too, p'r'aps, poor lass, who knows?—and he 'ooks it. Yes, gents, he's stepped it—depend upon it, he has."

Then all of a sudden Lucy's voice was heard in the hall below.

"Are they up stairs? Let me go to them at once!" she cried, bursting into the room. "I have news of him. He did come to the house; it was his hand I heard on the bell; his last visit was to me; he must have had foul play. Oh, dear Sirs, perhaps it isn't yet too late!"

"But, young lady," said Mr. Brass, "where did you get this bit of evidence?"

"From Mrs. Robinson, of Trinity Square. I knew John called there sometimes. He had a friend there, formerly a curate, who lodged there, and I went there to ask for him; and she saw him—at least, not she but her daughter—saw him go into our door, the yard door, you know, last night at nine, or soon after."

"And what is the daughter's name?"

"Patty, Patty Robinson."

Mr. Brass noted down the name and address, and then took his departure. If, indeed, John Jones had entered the yard of the Ebbsfleet Wharf soon after nine on the Sunday night, and had not been seen to come out, while the inmates of the house denied all knowledge of him, it looked queer. But even yet Mr. Brass didn't look kindly upon the case. The young man had absconded, and would turn up again shortly in the most prosaic way, robbing every body of their respective shares in his bounty money. Still it was a matter on which to keep an eye.

Lucy, meantime, had looked often and wistfully at the archdeacon. John had talked to her so much about his father and his godfather—she recognized them both by his description of them—and she had looked forward to their coming half in delight and half in trepidation. On the one hand, she had felt that to be received by John's father as his daughter would be one of the most delightful of experiences; on the other, she had shrunk shyly from the strangeness and stiffness of such a meeting. But that in John's father she would find a man who would not acknowledge her as a daughter had never occurred to her; and even in her grief and trouble at John's disappearance she felt an additional heart-ache at the coldness and formality with which she had been treated. Perhaps she had not sufficiently explained herself. It might have been an unmaidenly thing to come unaccompanied to her lover's rooms, to introduce herself unasked to his relatives. In her anxiety and trouble such things had been forgotten: she would explain to these two gentlemen, who looked so embarrassed by her presence, why and how she had forgotten them.

"Sir," she said, addressing the archdeacon, "perhaps I ought not to have come to you here; but when I found that John had disappeared—"

"Disappeared!" cried Sir Pantlin, testily; "the boy hasn't disappeared."

"That John had not come home last night, for I felt very uneasy ever since I heard his ring last night, and he not there—oh, I felt such a chill and shock! and when—you know how one can't shake off these forebodings—I found he really had not been heard of since then—oh, I felt sure something had happened, and I came here to find you and tell you what I know; for you know," said Lucy, blushing and looking down, "that I am to be his wife."

"Ahem, yes," said the archdeacon, coughing and choking. He had felt very guilty and troubled ever since he had heard about the ring at the bell, knowing how surely the errand on which he had sent his son had turned him away from that doorway, within which would have been safety for him that night. He had thought meanly, even suspiciously, of these Hulses, as people who had entrapped and deceived his boy. But he couldn't think meanly of Lucy as she stood before him in her purity and grace and helplessness. With the same trouble they were both pale and wan. For the same grief were their eyes suffused with tears.

The archdeacon looked at Sir Pantlin; Sir Pantlin looked at the archdeacon.

"Bless you, my dear," said Sir Pantlin at last, blowing his nose and coughing and spluttering. "Bless you, we've heard all about you, my dear. Only find the boy—only find him, my darling—and he shall marry you to-morrow—yes, by jingo! Eh, archdeacon?" he cried, turning fiercely upon his friend.

"Oh dear, oh dear, we shall never, never look upon his face again!" cried the archdeacon, shaking all over with excitement.

"Nonsense!" whispered Sir Pantlin. "Nonsense, Jack! you frightened the boy away by your harshness. Why the deuce couldn't you let the lad have his own way—a sweet girl like that, too? Begad, Jack, I'm ashamed of you!"

"Anwyl dad!" cried the archdeacon; "and you were worse against it than any body. But, oh, my dear, help us—help us two poor old men, who are half distracted—help us to find our boy!"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Dial Broughams.—A dead-and-gone Scandal.

THE two great sensations of this week have been the reappearance in public life of Mr. Bright and the publication of the autobiography of Mr. Mill.

The former on his re-election for Birmingham had an audience of 17,000 persons, and spoke for an hour and ten minutes with all his ancient eloquence and good sense, though the old fire was somewhat lacking. He told his fellow-countrymen, in his own vigorous language, exactly what the liberals have done for them, and what the Tories have not done. I am proud to think that with respect to the former I placed the case before you two months ago (under the head of "What Mr. Gladstone has done for us"), point by point, exactly as he describes it, so that there is no need for recapitulation. All England has now learned how the case stands between those two parties, stripped of all falsehood and "Buncombe." Where and where alone Mr. Bright is at odds with his own followers is in his curious views with respect to the adulteration of food—a matter which, in his admiration for free trade, he seems to imagine ought to be left to right itself. The executive, however, has, I am glad to say, decided otherwise; and should my milkman empty his can at my door, with any admixture of water in it, it costs me, it is true, 5*d.* a quart instead of 4*d.* (for the milkmen have naïvely admitted that if they are compelled to sell pure milk, they must charge twenty-five per cent. more for it); but it costs him £10 under the new act. I believe the good people in New York have protected themselves long ago from such practices.

But have you got dial carriages? These sound very much like an American invention, so ingenious are they and yet so simple! but they purport to be originated by a London jeweler. There is a dial on the splash-board under the eyes of the driver, and a duplicate dial within the carriage, and these are connected with one another by a tight chain. They are designed to supersede the check-string, but may even in many cases render the services of a footman unnecessary. On their faces are engraved every direction that is likely to be given by the inside passenger—"Fast," "Slow," "Go on," "Stop," "Stop right," "Stop left," "Club," "Home," "Wall Street"—and the handle strikes a bell that calls the attention of the coachman to these orders.

For my own part, I have not a dial brougham yet, and though of course "all my carriages" (as Mr. Whalley says) can be fitted with this new invention, what would form a very pretty present at Christmas-time (which is now approaching) from an editor to his contributor, or from a body of readers to their favorite writer in their favorite periodical, would be a dial brougham.

"General society, as now carried on in England, is so insipid an affair, even to the persons who make it what it is, that it is kept up for any other reason rather than the pleasure it affords. All serious discussion on matters on which opinions differ being considered ill-bred, and the national deficiency in liveliness and sociability having prevented the cultivation of the art of talking agreeably on trifles, in which the French of the last century so much excelled, the sole attraction of what is called society to those who are not at the top of the tree is the hope of being able to climb a little higher in it.....To persons of any but a very common order in thought or feeling such society, unless he has personal objects to serve by it, must be supremely unattractive; and most people, in the present day, of any really high class of intellect, make their contact with it so slight, and at such long intervals, as to be almost considered as retiring from it altogether."

The above is the verdict passed upon general society by Mr. John Stuart Mill in his recent autobiography, and it being in the main true enough, general society doesn't like it. They can not ignore Mr. Mill's opinions, but they revenge themselves by abusing his book. It is open, indeed, to objections upon all points, except its style, which is absolutely faultless. The curiosity of it lies in two things: first, in the fact that the author should have thought it worth while to defend himself from the charge of being a prig (which in youth he most unquestionably was); and secondly, that he seems quite unaware of the total revolution in his own character that took place after his emancipation from his father (a perfect nigger-driver in his high-pressure education of his son), and upon his acquaintance with the lady (Mrs. Taylor) who eventually became his wife. He protests that to her—not to her encouragement and sympathy merely, but to herself, her intelligence, learning, and aspirations—is owing at least one-half of all that he has written and accomplished; that what was wanting in his mind she supplied, being, among other things, "a greater poet than Carlyle." "Come, come!" says society; "this will not do. We knew Mrs. Mill, some of us, tolerably well, and all this is hyperbole. She was a clever woman, with a very retentive memory; and since she remembered and repeated her husband's views, it is only reasonable that he should have set her down as the wisest and most admirable of womankind."

A curious disinterment of an old scandal has just come to light at Brighton. A Civil and United Service Club has been just established in what was once the marine residence of the famous Mrs. Fitzherbert, the twice-married beauty whose charms conquered the susceptible Prince Regent, afterward George IV., though she was seven years his senior, and caused him to contract with her what was almost a morganatic marriage; and the alterations made in the house have revealed a fact which scandal always whispered—that a subterranean passage existed between the fair lady's residence and the Pavilion, that of his royal highness. The incident has stirred up the dust of that dead-and-gone intrigue in a very ghastly manner.

There is doubtless many a good whist-player in New York who has dropped a tear—or its equivalent, for I suppose few whist-players do drop tears—over poor James Clay, the best partner and most formidable opponent who ever sat down to whist, and the writer of the text-book of that noble game. He sat in Parliament many years for Hull, and was the proposer of the once famous educational franchise, to which it was humorously objected that "it would exclude the aristocracy." If not witty himself, he was the cause of wit in others, and the last thing that has been put into his "poor dumb mouth" is as follows: Once upon a time—but once—he lost a game by trumping a thirteenth card. This weighed upon his mind as a murder would have done upon the conscience of any other man, and gave him nightmare for weeks. "I dream," said he, "of meeting that thirteenth spade in a very narrow lane, where there is no room to pass it, and therefore I am obliged to trump him." If this is not worthy of Charles Lamb, my name is not R. KEMBLE, of London.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE public mind is specially interested just at present in regard to gold and silver coin, and the possible resumption of "specie payment." Many of us have almost forgotten the times when dollars, half and quarter dollars, with smaller silver coin, and possibly a sprinkling of gold pieces, jingled in our purses—those old-fashioned purses, which, being no fit receptacle for greenbacks and paper currency, are, perchance, laid away in some unfrequented drawer, and may yet prove useful. "In view of this subject"—as lecturers and clergymen are accustomed to say—a few items, taken in substance from the annual report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ending with June last, may not be uninteresting to our readers. The amount of gold and silver deposits and purchases, coins struck and stamped, and bars manufactured during the year was as follows: gold deposited, $59,937,429 45; silver deposited, $12,307,389 43; total amount received and acted on, $72,244,818 88. Deducting deposits made and issued by one institution and deposited with another, the deposits were, gold, $57,704,385 88; silver, $9,145,328 43; total, $66,849,714 31. The total number of gold and silver pieces coined was 32,523,670, having a total value of $38,639,183. The value of bars of fine gold and silver manufactured, and of imported gold and silver, amounted to $27,517,530 61. Some idea of the increase of operations may be obtained by the statement that the coinage of gold during the month of October approximated in value $14,000,000, the coin, except as to the Pacific coast States and Territories, being, as a general thing, in the Treasury and banks. From the most reliable data obtainable at the present time, the gold coin now in the country is estimated at $135,000,000, and subsidiary silver, $5,000,000; total, $140,000,000. The silver coin is principally in circulation in California, Oregon, Nevada, Idaho, Arizona, and Texas. Of the coin now in the Treasury, about $5,000,000 will need to be renovated. A much greater loss results, in process of time, from natural abrasion than would be generally supposed; and when a large number of pieces are so worn as to be below the prescribed standard, it is necessary that there should be a recoinage. It is stated that there has not been a recoinage of gold in this country since that which followed the change of standard in 1834, and that in the very large exports of coin since the suspension of specie payments in 1861, the unworn coin were selected for that purpose, and the light or worn pieces excluded. In the course of a few months it is probable that the New Orleans Mint will be in a condition for coinage operations; and the new mint edifice which has been for some time past in the course of construction at San Francisco is nearly completed. It is now being fitted up with the necessary machinery and apparatus, and, it is expected, will be finished by July, 1874. It is a large building—though none too large for its purpose—and will doubtless be one of the best appointed mints in the world.

At Clapham, one of the most agreeable suburbs of London, a model village is in course of completion for clerks, artisans, and laborers of limited means. There have been two hundred applications for the first seventy houses. These houses are commodious, and each has a garden. The rent of one having nine or ten rooms is from $90 to $100. All are built on the most approved sanitary and architectural principles. Provision is made for schools, lecture-room, bath and wash houses, play-grounds, and churches.

The term "blue," which is sometimes applied to Presbyterians, originated from the peculiar dress of the Scotch Presbyterian clergy, which was a blue gown and a broad blue bonnet.

As Boston now wants a park, and does not know where to locate it, an exchange sagaciously suggests the Berkshire Hills, which a little more "annexion" would bring in.

A Connecticut manufacturer, instead of running his mills at Yantic on half time, has adopted a system of giving his operatives three days vacation in each week, one-half alternating with the other, the mill running full time, and for their advantage has established in an engine-house of the corporation a free school, employing a spinner fully competent to take charge of it. Not only the children, but adults, are improving the opportunities thus afforded. The example of this manufacturer is worthy of imitation.

Agricultural statistics from Ireland report the obnoxious growth of weeds all over the country, and the inefficacy of all efforts yet made to keep them down. These efforts, however, are of a curious kind—a prominent one being instruction by the inspector to school-children "to give their best attention to uprooting weeds by the road-sides and in the fields!"

For two or three years past drawing has been one of the regular studies in the Massachusetts public schools. This branch is likely to prove very serviceable to the scholars in after-life; but it has been found difficult to obtain competent teachers. The Legislature has now provided for the establishment of a State Normal Art School, which has been opened this month with a limited number of pupils. Instrumental drawing will be taught by lectures, and free-hand drawing by individual instruction, as also painting and designing. Lectures will also be given on architecture and building construction, machine drawing, orthographic projection, isometric projection, projection of shades and shadows, geometric drawing, and perspective.

A communication from Fordyce Barker, M.D., of this city, which recently appeared in the New York Times, contains some statements of general interest in regard to the evils resulting from the condition of our pavements. He says:

"The imperfect surface drainage, the want of cleanliness, and the distracting noise of our streets, are shortening the lives of our citizens, and are not only maintaining, if not increasing, the death rate, but surely inviting pestilence to the city. The energies of the Board of Health have no doubt been severely taxed by the enormous amount of work it has performed, but were its powers ten times greater than at present, they would not be adequate to the task of cleaning 300 miles of streets paved as ours are. In fact, it is next to impossible to thoroughly clean a stone pavement. Its crevices will always afford lodgments for comminuted decaying organic matter, furnishing a fertile soil for fungoid development. Especially is this the case where the pavements have become broken or sunken, forming receptacles which collect and conserve those rejected elements of life, which at the same time express and invoke death."

Dr. Barker also forcibly comments upon one constant annoyance of city life, from which many persons experience acute suffering, but of which few realize the actual danger. He remarks:

"Very few appreciate the effect of persistent noise on the nervous system. We now see very little of the gentle decline of old age in this city. When our busy men die they fall with little or no premonition, like soldiers in the crash of battle. The toughest railway iron is shattered by a sufficient number of comparative slight blows. It resists without external change, but interiorly its filiform structure gradually becomes granular, and the end of the transition is marked by the blow which fractures the rail. So the strong business man, accustomed to the din of travel and traffic, endures it for a period without evidence of injury, until one day comes when the nervous system, suddenly shattered, announces the close of his business career and the imminence of dissolution."

The opinion is expressed by Dr. Barker that the asphalt concretes which have been used extensively in London during the last five years have almost completely overcome the objectionable features of stone pavement as to drainage, cleanliness, and noise.

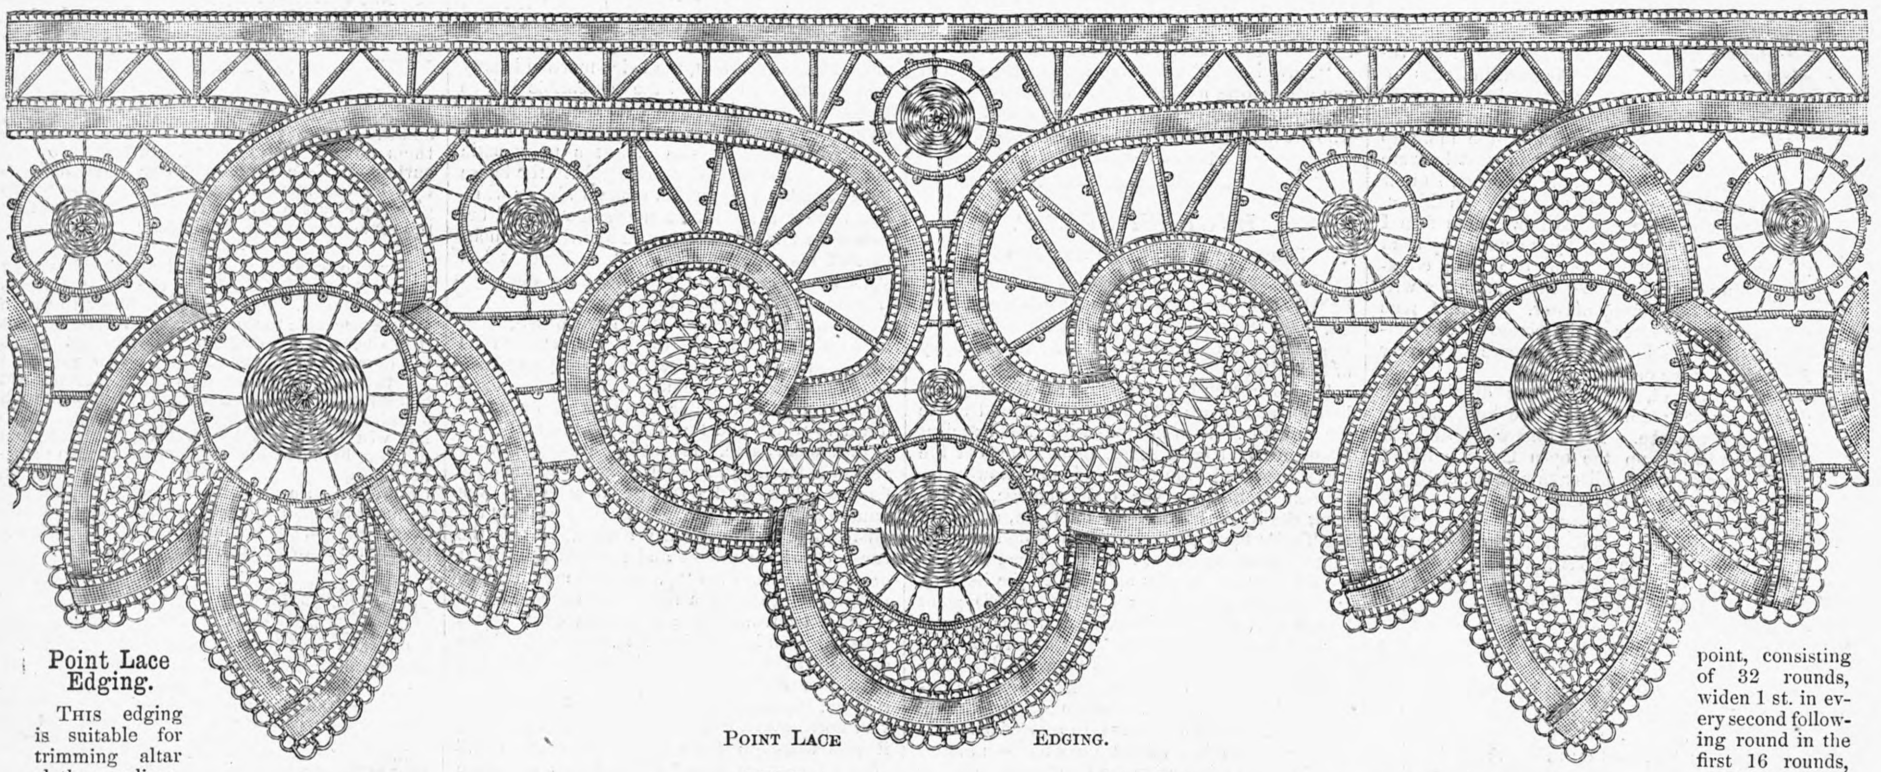
The castle of Ardverikie has been almost totally destroyed by fire. One feature within the castle was a number of wall-etchings, life size, by the late Sir Edwin Landseer. When a guest at the castle the great painter thus decorated three sides of the walls of the drawing-room, all the subjects being connected with the chase. These relics of Landseer, which were regarded as of inestimable value, have been totally destroyed. For three years past extensive additions have been made to the building, and these were but recently finished.

St. Petersburg is built upon low land, and is always in some danger of inundation from the Neva. In 1824 the waters of the Neva rose eighteen feet above their usual level, and there was a frightful flood. Since that time there has been no inundation so serious as that which occurred about the middle of October. A violent storm of wind and rain commenced about sunset, the water rose rapidly, and the lower part of the town was completely flooded. Many of the streets were literally rivers. Trees in the public gardens were uprooted, telegraph wires torn down, several coasting ships actually floated into the streets, and poor people, panic-stricken, abandoned their little property, glad to escape with their lives. The Zoological Gardens were completely under water, and the proprietors had the greatest difficulty in saving the animals. The elephant in particular gave a great deal of trouble, but he was at last led in safety to the nearest police station, where he remained for the night. To add to the horrors of the night, no less than four fires occurred. Soon after two o'clock in the morning the wind changed, and the water fell as rapidly as it had risen. The loss of property in St. Petersburg was very great, but it is believed no lives were lost.

A New Hampshire paper publishes the following as a fact: "In Dover, on Thursday, a $100 bill actually paid debts amounting to $1000, and within eight hours returned to the man who first paid it out in the morning. It happened that A owed B $100; he paid it. B owed C $100, so he paid the bill over to him. Thus it went, and the ninth gentleman to whom it was paid, happening to owe A $100, paid it over to him, so that it paid all these debts and came back to the original owner."

Unfortunately for the Adventists of Terry Island, in the Connecticut River, the end of the world failed to come off, as advertised, on the 5th of November. They are doubtless greatly disappointed at the non-fulfillment of their prophecies.

Powder will explode. This fact was recently discovered by a Detroit boy, who, with several members of the family, was watching the process of drying half a pound of damp powder in an oyster can. They were scattered in various directions.



POINT LACE EDGING.

Point Lace Edging.

THIS edging is suitable for trimming altar cloths, surplices, dresses, etc., and is worked in point lace embroidery with point lace braid and thread as shown by the illustration.

Knitted and Crochet Hood for Girl from 1 to 2 Years old.

See illustration on page 777.

THIS hood is worked with white zephyr worsted and coarse steel knitting-needles in rounds going back and forth, all knit plain, and ornamented with single long stitches of pink worsted. The pointed outer edge of the cape is bordered with one round of sc. (single crochet) with pink worsted. Bows and ends of pink satin ribbon form the trimming. The crown of the hood consists of a round piece twelve inches in diameter. Begin the crown from the under edge with a foundation of 20 st. (stitch), and going back and forth on these knit 126 rounds all plain, but to the 30th round widen at the beginning and end of each round always 1 st. Then knit 66 rounds without widening, and 30 rounds more in which always narrow 1 st. at the beginning and end of each round. Chain off the remaining st. on the needle. The cape and front with pointed outer edge are worked crosswise in rounds going back and forth. For the cape make a foundation of 12 st., and on these knit, forming points on one side, 212 rounds all plain; in the first 16 rounds, at the end of every second following round, widen 1 st.; and in the following 14 rounds narrow 1 st. in every second following round. The next two points are worked in a similar manner, but in the hollow of each point the number of stitches is increased by 1 st. each. In the fourth point, consisting of 32 rounds, widen 1 st. in every second following round in the first 16 rounds, and in the following 16 rounds narrow 1 st. each. The last 3 points are worked to correspond with the first 3 points, but in reversed order. For the front, which is worked in a similar manner, make a foundation of 7 st., and on one side form 5 points like these previously described. Border the cape and front on the pointed edges with one round of sc. with pink worsted, and ornament each part with long stitches of pink worsted as shown by the illustration. Work for a binding eighteen inches and seven-eighths long a chain stitch foundation of the requisite length with white worsted, close it in a ring with one slip stitch, and on this crochet 3 rounds of double crochets, working one on each st. Join the crown of the hood from the wrong side with the edge st. of the last round of this binding by means of overhand stitches, in doing which the crown is slightly gathered; then sew the cape and front together with the foundation st. of the binding, gathering the cape at the same time; the front, however, is set on entirely smooth, and is bordered on the front edge with one round of sc. with pink worsted. Finally, set on pink satin ribbon between the crown and cape as shown by the illustration, and furnish the hood with bows and strings.

Fig. 1.—WATER-PROOF CLOAK FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 24–29.

Fig. 2.—WATER-PROOF CLOAK FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 24–29.

Crochet and Knitted Cap for Boy from 1 to 2 Years old.

See illustration on page 777.

THIS cap is worked with white zephyr worsted in Afghan stitch (like that of the girl's crochet, netted, and knitted hood, No. VI., Figs. 30–32, Supplement),

Fig. 1.—GRAY CASHMERE DRESS.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 15–20.

Fig. 2.—GRAY CASHMERE DRESS.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 15–20.

Google

and ornamented with crochet cord of blue worsted. The pointed rim which lies on the cap is bordered with one round of sc. (single crochet) of blue worsted. The trimming consists of a feather knitted in loop stitch with white worsted and blue satin bows. For the crown of the cap cut of net or paper a round piece twelve inches in diameter. Begin the crown on the under edge with a foundation of 60 st. (stitch); 40 of these are designed for the widening at the left side, and 20 st. for the first pr. (pattern row) of the crown. The widening and narrowing are done on the outer edge to suit the shape of the round part. For the pointed strip twenty inches long make a foundation of 90 st., crochet on these 5 pr. in Afghan stitch, then 6 sc. on the last round of the sixth pr., 6 sc. on the edge st. at the left side of these 6 pr., 4 sc. on the next 4 st. of the strip, and then repeat eight times from ∗. The ends of this pointed strip are sewed up from the wrong side, and the outer edge of the strip is bordered with a round of sc. of blue worsted. Crochet for a binding 20 inches wide a foundation of the requisite length, close it in a ring with one slip stitch, and work 5 rounds of double crochet—one unnoticed knit one round all plain. Turn the work, draw the mesh out of the loops, lay on the mesh behind the needles, and with the treble thread strand knit one loop round all plain. Again push the st. to the opposite end of the needle, knit with the single thread one round purled, and repeat the last four rounds seven times more, in doing which always widen 1 st. at the beginning and end of the first round in the first, second, third, and fourth repetitions, and in the sixth and seventh repetitions always narrow 1 st. Fasten the finished feather on the cap as shown by the illustration, and cover the seam with a bow of blue satin ribbon; a similar bow is set on in the middle of the back of the cap. Finish with strings of similar ribbon.

KNITTED AND CROCHET HOOD FOR GIRL FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.

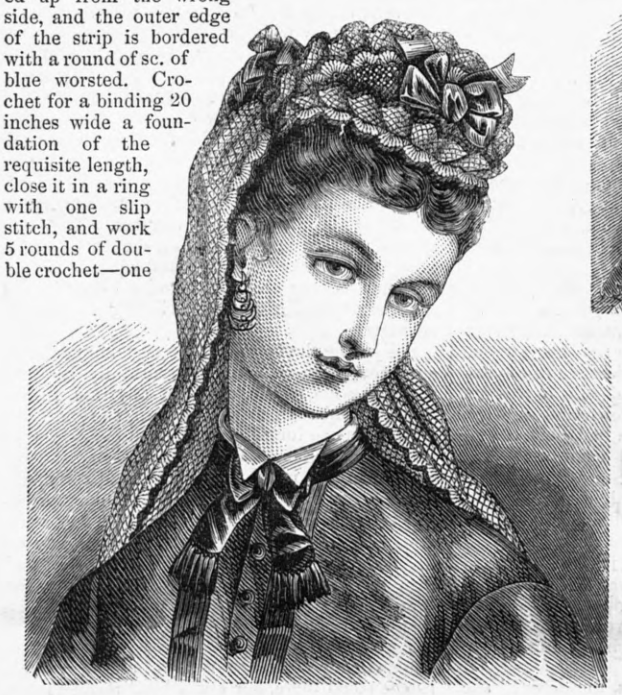


Fig. 1.—KNITTED AND CROCHET FANCHON HOOD.

KNITTED, NETTED, AND CROCHET HOOD FOR GIRL FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 30-32.

Knitted and Crochet Fanchon Hoods, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE fanchon hoods are knitted with white zephyr worsted and steel needles in an open-work design, and are trimmed with colored ribbon.

Fig. 1.—For the crown work in an open-work design a

LADY'S FLANNEL UNDER-VEST.

For pattern and description see Suppl., No. IV., Figs. 21-23.

KNITTED AND CROCHET CAP FOR BOY FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.

round part nine inches and three-quarters in diameter, which is folded in a revers in front. Begin this part from the under edge with a foundation of 10 st. (stitch), and going back and forth on this knit 22 rounds of always alternately t. t. o. (thread thrown over), k. (knit) 2 together; at the beginning and end of every second following round, however, always widen 1 st. Knit 10 rounds without changing the number of st., then 22 rounds more in which always narrow 1 st. at the beginning and end of every second following round. The last 10 st. are then chained off. Begin the strings from the under edge with a foundation of 8 st., and on these knit in the same design 16 rounds, in doing which always widen 1 st. at the beginning and end of each round. Now follow 20 rounds without widening, then 2 rounds, in which always narrow 1 st. at the beginning and end, and 92 rounds without changing the number of st.; then cast off. Edge the strings with three rounds in crochet-work: the first two of these rounds are worked with white worsted, and the third round with light purple floss silk, as follows: 1st round.—Always 1 sc. (single crochet) on each edge st. on the sides and on the under edge of the

Fig. 2.—KNITTED AND CROCHET FANCHON HOOD.

on each st. On the edge st. of the last round sew, first, the crown of the cap, which is at the same time laid in pleats at regular intervals, and then join the pointed strip on the straight outer edge with the under edge of the binding by means of one round of sc. of blue worsted. Ornament the crown with the cord as shown by the illustration, and the points of the rim with long stitches, which at the same time fasten the rim on the crown. The feather on the cap is worked crosswise in loop stitch with white zephyr worsted, alternately with a single and a treble thread of the same worsted, and with very coarse steel needles, as follows: Make a foundation of 4 st. with the single thread, and knit one round all purled. Pay no attention to the single thread, lay on the treble thread strand, and with the latter knit one loop round as follows: 1 p. (purled), insert the needle in the following st. as if going to p. the st., lay on a mesh an inch and a quarter in circumference before the needle, form a loop, winding the thread strand from the under toward the upper side once on the mesh and at the same time on the needle, purl the st., and repeat this twice, so that three loops are formed. Push the st. on the needle to the opposite end, and with the single thread previously left finished knitted parts. 2d round.—∗ 1 sc. on the next st. of the preceding round, 1 ch. (chain stitch), 5 dc. (double crochet) on the second following st., 1 ch., with this pass over 1 st., and repeat from ∗. 3d round.—∗ 1 sc. on the next sc. of the preceding round, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the next 5 dc., 4 ch., with these pass over 3 st., and repeat from ∗. For the ruffles knit on a foundation of the requisite length 7 rounds in the same design, and border this strip with a crochet round of purple floss silk as follows: Always alternately work off the next st. on the needle together with the t. t. o. with 1 sc., 5 ch. Fold the crown in a revers on the front edge, so that the revers is two inches and seven-eighths wide in the middle of the front, and in order to make it stand up stiff furnish it with a lining of white stiff lace. Gather the ruffles, and sew them on the hood as shown by the illustration. The seam made by doing this is covered with crochet points like those on the outer edge of the strings. Gather the latter on the upper edge, and join them with the crown. Finally, set on bows of purple silk ribbon.

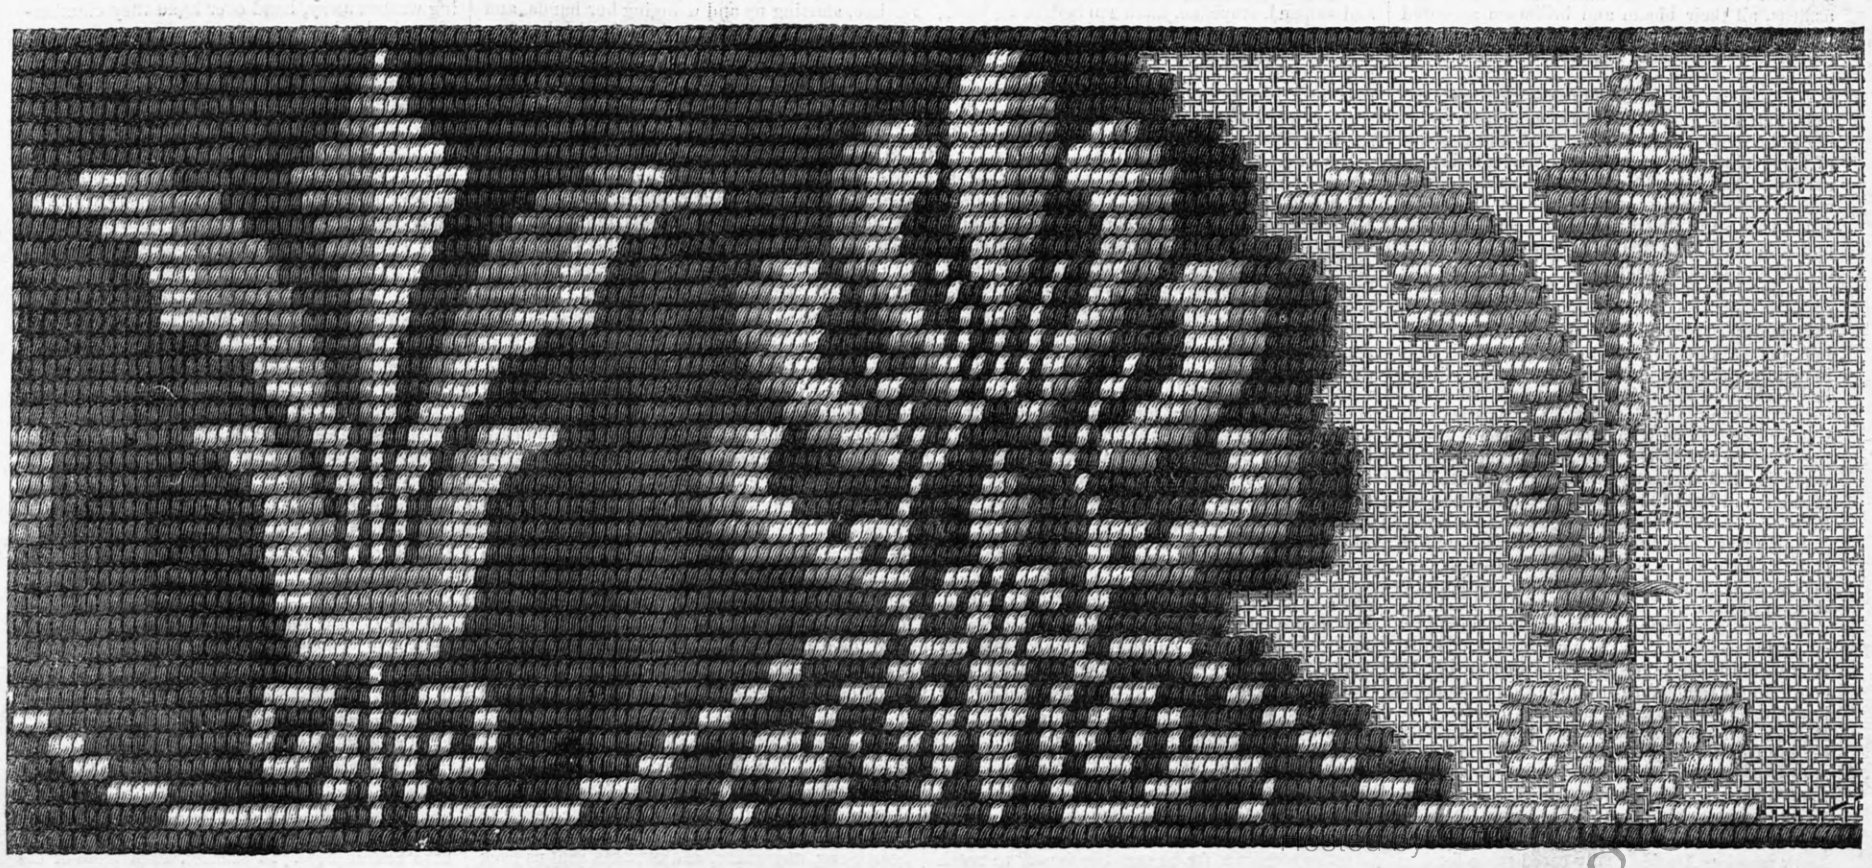

Fig. 2.—MANNER OF MAKING GOBELIN EMBROIDERY FOR RUG.—[See Fig. 1, Page 773.]

Fig. 2 consists of a three-cornered crown, fourteen inches and a half long and six inches wide through the middle, of strips arranged in ruffles, and besides this, of a strip forty-four inches long on the outer edge, which begins at two corners of the crown and is continued in the back as a streamer. For the crown make a foundation of 165 st. (stitch), beginning from the back edge, and on this foundation knit in rounds going back and forth, as follows: 1st round.—All purled. 2d round.—Always alternately k. (knit) 3 together, on the next st. 1 k. (knit plain), 1 p. (purled), 1 k. Repeat these two rounds 20 times, and in doing this narrow always 2 st. at the beginning and end of every round. This part is bordered on the outer edge, first with one round of sc. (single crochet), and then with two crochet rounds, as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet) on the next st. of the outer edge, 1 ch. (chain stitch), with this pass over 1 st. 2d round.—∗ 1 sc. on the next dc. of the preceding round, 1 ch., 5 dc. on the following dc., 1 ch., 1 sc. on the next dc.; repeat from ∗. In connection with this work for the streamer on a ch. foundation thirty-six inches long two rounds like those before described. For the ruffle on the front of the fanchon work a knitted strip; to do this make a foundation of 154 st., and on these knit 14 rounds, going back and forth, as follows: 1st round.—Alternately t. t. o. (thread thrown over), k. 2 together. 2d round (right side of the work).—All knit plain. 3d round.—∗ Twice alternately t. t. o., 1 k., then four times alternately t. t. o., k. 2 together, then t. t. o., 1 k.; repeat from ∗. Repeat the 2d and 3d rounds five times, knit one round more all plain, and then cast off. The foundation st. form the under edge of the strip. In a similar manner work for the second ruffle a strip of 16 rounds on a foundation of 132 st. Gather the finished strips, and sew them on the front edge of the crown, so that they stand upright, as shown by the illustration, and the front strip covers the seam of the back strip. On a foundation of 242 st. work 16 rounds like those before described, and join this strip from the wrong side with the streamer worked previously in crochet-work. Finally, run narrow pink satin ribbon through the first of the two rounds bordering the crown and the strip. Set on the bows as shown by the illustration.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

ONCE on a time, while jewels flashed
And rose-hid fountains softly splashed,
And all the air was sweet and bright
With music, mirth, and deft delight,
A courtly dame drew, laughing, near
A poet, greatest of his time,
And chirped a question in his ear
With voice like silver bells in chime:
"Good Mr. Shakspeare! I would know
The name thy lady bore, in sooth,
Ere thine? Nay, little while ago
It was—for still we mark her youth—
Some high-born name, I trow, and yet,
Though I have heard it, I forget."
Then answered he,
With dignity,
Yet blithely—as the hour was gay—
"Ann Hathaway."

"And good, sweet Sir," the dame pursued,
Too fair and winsome to be rude,
"'Tis whispered here, and whispered there,
By doughty knights and ladies fair,
That—that—well, that her loyal lord
Doth e'en obey her slightest will.
Now, my good spouse, I pledge my word,
Though loving well, doth heed me ill.
How art thou conquered? prithee tell,"
She pleaded with her pretty frown;
"I fain would know what mighty spell
Can bring a haughty husband down."
She ceased, and raised her eager face
To his with laughing, plaintive grace.
Then answered he,
With dignity,
Yet blithely—as the hour was gay—
"Ah, lady, I can only say,
Ann hath a way."

ANSTICE'S THANKSGIVING.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

I THINK the loveliest sight I ever saw, save one—and that I will tell you about presently—was our garden party.

Though we lived on the sea-shore, our grounds had a southerly exposure, and in June they were a region of roses—roses and honeysuckles and azaleas, all their bloom and brilliance accented by the dark background of hemlocks; and here, on Anstice's eighteenth birthday, we had our garden party.

Anstice was so pretty herself—with her long hair, that was not quite yellow enough for gold, nor quite dark enough for chestnut, and was full of short glistening ripples, and her soft brown eyes, and her color like that of the roses themselves—I was looking at her from my place; for I had been so ill that I was not one of the party, and they had only drawn my chair to the window above; and I remember thinking that Anstice was so pretty herself that, as Ralph said, she could make a sunshine in a shady place. When he said it, Stuart Maynardier turned with a quick look that said he resented the liberty Ralph took in making the quotation at all; for ever since Ralph had come into the neighborhood Stuart had assumed a certain proprietary right in Anstice that was amusing to us who knew how she detested him, and had observed how eagerly she listened whenever Ralph was speaking, and how she had pressed and kept the flower he chanced to give her.

Ralph was quite alone in the world, though he came of good stock, as Dr. Sterling used to say; and he was in our part of the country with an invention of his own—a marine torpedo, I believe, which was to be tested by the gun-boats anchored off the cape; and, if the government accepted it, it would make him such rapid wealth that he could afford thenceforth to do nothing—nothing but pursue his studies in science. So far from Ralph's doing nothing, he was the soul of industry, and of that inexhaustible and almost holy curiosity in the matters of the universe that belongs to the true sons of science. Dr. Sterling had introduced him at our house, and he had proved an invaluable companion; and I don't know whether Anstice really cared more for him than mamma or I or any of the rest of us did, though I suppose hers was a different sort of caring; for one spring twilight I saw them in the garden, slowly sauntering down a walk to the terraces of the violet beds, and his arm was about her then, and they stopped to put their faces into a pink almond bough, and the faces were so close together they kissed each other, and I had no doubt that they had done it before, and I had no doubt, either, that Stuart Maynardier had seen the same, for he was coming in under the grape arbor at that moment, and he suddenly turned on his heel and went softly out. So it was to all intents and purposes an engagement between Ralph and Anstice; but, as they told mamma, they had a sentimental feeling about his work, and didn't want the engagement announced till the day his torpedo was tested and named a success.

Well, that was to be, as it happened, on the morning of Anstice's birthday, and so it had been decided that our garden party should take place in the afternoon. But when the day before arrived, owing to some illness of the commander of the chosen gun-boat, the test was postponed a day. However, it was too late to put off the garden party, and the guests began to come as early as noon—gentlemen and ladies, and lovely girls in all manner of bright dresses, like animated flowers themselves, as they floated about under the blue sky among the opening flowers in the sunshine. The strawberries and cream were set out under the marquee, and the target was up on the lawn for the archery; for one of Anstice's delights was in the archery just then beginning to be popular, and she had coaxed mamma over to what mamma at first thought very unladylike, and she had imported a bow a little taller than herself, a magnificent thing made of some polished and half-transparent material, and boxes of bowstrings from India in rolls and coils, and arrows of all devices known; and she had become a fine markswoman, and her example had been followed till archery parties were all the fashion about us.

Ralph had been detained, and had not arrived when it was time for the archery that afternoon, and Stuart had been busying himself with the bows for one and another; and having given Anstice hers, he ran down to make sure that the target on the fence that bounded the grounds there on the edge of the hill was all right. In that moment he must have seen who was coming; for, as he ran back, he cried out, "Quick, Miss Anstice! They wait for you to lead off! Quick!" And Anstice, standing in position, drew her bowstring, and just as I was feebly crying out from my window, where I could see it all, the arrow was flying, and Ralph's head was appearing above the fence at the target—Ralph, unaware that the archery had begun, and saving time, as usual, by bounding over a hedge in his agile way. That instant she saw what she was doing, too late to help it. The arrow had left the string. But probably that desperation in which she unconsciously tossed her bow upward deflected it from its course, for though it flew, it flew far on one side, and struck Stuart, and he fell at the same moment that Anstice threw herself on the ground, hiding her face. Half of the throng in the garden, in less time than you could tell it, were clustering round Anstice, and half of them round Stuart, and Ralph had dropped instantaneously from his dangerous perch, and was dashing round the long way to the gate. But in a breath Anstice was on her feet again, and running toward the other group. She never thought of Stuart Maynardier: her mind was full of the horrid thought that she had killed Ralph, and she burst through the people, seeing only a form, face down, upon the ground; for Dr. Sterling and another person were bending in such a manner that they rather hid the head, and she had flung herself beside it, calling out, "Oh! my darling, my darling! Have I killed you? Oh, speak to me! speak to your own Anstice!" And as she spoke, Ralph was hurrying down the path, and saw and heard it all, and stopped, stupefied, unable to believe his ears, and yet hearing her address these words to Stuart Maynardier, seeing her bend above him, and fall senseless in a long, still swoon—a swoon that rapt her in the great revulsion she experienced when she saw that it was Stuart whom she had thus adjured before the multitude.

Stuart had only been partially stunned by the stroke of the arrow, not seriously, and was already regaining his senses as they lifted Anstice. He had heard her; and I suppose the possibilities in the case flashed upon him before he fairly opened his eyes, for he sat up at once, rubbing his head and smiling languidly, and then drinking both of the water and the wine that were brought him; and almost directly he was on his feet again, staggering a little, but hastening to Anstice, whom they were trying to recover without waiting to take her into the house. And of course they made way for him after what they had heard, and he was kneeling beside her with her hand in his—for mamma was in the marquee, and the two girls and Aunt Maria were thunderstruck and bewildered—bending over her as he had never dared to bend, as he had never had the chance to approach her before, and gently drawing off unseen the ring she always wore—a curious ring of three diamonds set so as to be strung like beads on their three wires, and make any design into which she chose to move them—a ring concerning which Anstice had once said to Ralph, as she afterward told me, "It was worn by my grandmother for a wedding-ring, and I shall give it to my lover on the day he acknowledges me before the world."

It was all in less than five minutes; and Ralph would have been a person of superhuman self-control and discrimination if, at all he saw and heard, he had not been in a transport of anger. He had stood still in his amazement, in spite of Anstice's falling, for he was too far off to reach her; and now at the sight of Stuart bending beside her he strode toward mamma, coming from the marquee.

"Will you tell me what this means?" he cried, hoarsely.

But mamma pushed past him without hearing, and Anstice was carried into the house, and the pretty garden party broke up in confusion.

And it was just under my window that Ralph met Stuart, and repeated his demand, this time with an uplifted hand.

"Will you tell me what this means?"

"I should think it is very evident what it means," said Stuart, with a cool sneer.

"Do you intend to say, Mr. Maynardier—"

"I intend to say nothing. You heard Anstice say enough," said Stuart, regardless of the suspended thunder on Ralph's brow. "She is a little coquette, and I dare say has smiled on more lovers than one. But this afternoon has put an end to all that. Now she is mine by open proclamation, and I warn all others out of the way."

"It is a lie!" shouted Ralph. And in another moment his falling hand would have felled Stuart in the path. But Stuart slipped aside, and Ralph's hand fell, in shame, perhaps, that he would have struck a man just recovering from a blow.

"I won't dispute you," said Stuart, again, with his calm sneer, "because I know your disappointment. But if you doubt such evidences as your senses have just given you, what do you say to this?" And he extended his hand, on whose fourth finger the ring with its three diamonds was glittering. Ralph tossed up the hand extended before him, and turned and plunged out of the garden, though I called after him as loudly as I could; but my sick and trembling voice hardly left my lips; and I was taken back to bed, and to a new access of fever, in which I lived among shadows for a week.

When I gathered strength enough to remember that afternoon I noticed that Anstice sat in the window, clothed in deep black, and looking out to sea, and by-and-by they told me what had followed.

Ralph had the next morning been called to test his torpedo; and he had gone to do it, strangely, Anstice thought, without coming to see her, or inquiring for her after her swoon. And when there was some hinderance to the explosion down below, Ralph had said it was his invention, and his place to go down and see what the matter might be. And he had gone down, and on the instant there had come a muffled shock, and the sea was tossing in a huge fountain, white with the foam of mighty waves, and the distant gun-boats rocked with the swell, and Ralph never came up again that they saw.

I waited a little while; but it seemed best to do, and so I told Anstice of what I had seen and heard. And Anstice swept down the stairs, in her black dress, and met Stuart coming in; for he had been obsequiously kind in coming to help and sympathize.

"You are a murderer!—a murderer!" she cried. "Give me back the ring you stole! You meant to make me kill him myself when you called to me to shoot, and then you drove him to his death! Give me back my ring, you murderer!" And white as ashes, and trembling before her angry majesty and fire, he gave her back the ring he kept concealed, and went away. He was very ill after that, and then the doctor had sent him to the West Indies, and we heard no more of him.

And so our gay home became a dark and sad one. Once in a while we had a dreary hope that Ralph had been picked up by an outward-bound craft, and would be back, and persuaded by reflection that Anstice was incapable of loving any but himself; but as time passed the hope died, and we did the best we could. And part of the time Anstice locked herself in her room, and part of the time she roamed off into the woods, or sat on the bluff gazing across the sea; and then, as if the sight of its splendor, as all its shining scales sparkled and crept shoreward, grew too terrible, starting up and wringing her hands, and coming home and lying on the sofa with her face hidden. And she grew like the spirit of herself—so thin, so fair, so shining-haired, dark-eyed, and beautiful! we began to fear that Anstice was going too. And so the summer passed, and it was near the winter weather, with snow and sleet and storms.

It was the 24th of November, and it had been a steady storm all day, rising at dark into a terrific gale, and we awoke at midnight with such a tempest beating about us as we had never felt. The wind came in billows, you might say, rolling against the side of the house, and the snow and the hail swept in furious eddies, while the sea rose upon the rocks, and flooded the garden, and roared with an awful and unceasing thunder. We were quaking in the unnamed fear that a night storm brings, with all the horrors from the unknown elements of darkness and preternatural force, and when we heard the first minute-gun, and did not believe we heard it, we sprang out of bed and ran to look for the light of the light-house; but the light was out, and we found by-and-by that its iron pillars had been snapped off like flower-stems. We dressed, and summoned the servants, and those that could keep their breath labored out with lanterns to the bluff, now and then throwing themselves down in order not to be blown with the drifting snow Heaven knew where; and they tried to kindle a bonfire, but it was useless—the storm extinguished faster than they could rebuild it. So they came back, and we lighted up all the sea-side windows of the house, and we waited together, the minute-gun still booming, till at last we thought we heard it long after there was no sound but the terrible sounds of the storm. But after a while the gale began to abate, and we dropped asleep, on the sofa, on the hearth-rug, any where, and mamma sent us back to bed; and when we woke there was a gray sky, and the wind had gone down, though the sea was still swelling and roaring and running white. But presently the sun rose in a golden glow upon an icy world, glittering back in splendor, and there was a blue sky and the perfect glory of a clear autumnal day; and the girls came running into our rooms to tell us there was a vessel ashore on the reef below the bluff, an awful sight—broken, half dismasted, the sea running over her bows, her cordage pendent with huge icicles, and men, like icicles themselves, clinging in the rigging.

Before we could reach the bluff the fishermen from the village were up there with ropes and cables and boat-hooks, taking measures that resulted in nothing, for there was nothing they could do. It was impossible to launch a boat. In such a sea no one could swim a stroke; and though the little broken brig was almost within hailing distance, nobody could have heard a word in all that crying of the sea; and before rockets could be brought from the town, on which to send a line flying over the deck, the brig would go to pieces. One by one the poor wretches in the rigging were dropping off, and a battered body was washed up, and was caught with a boat-hook by old Ben Morse—a warning to any who would have ventured out.

One of the fishermen had his spy-glass with him. "Don't we know one of them chaps?" said he; and he gave the glass to us, and we saw, or thought we saw, the plaid Scotch cap that we had seen before, the fair hair, the insolent, handsome face, now white and awful in the supreme hour that confronted it. "By King!" said old Ben, "it's young Maynardier! And this is the brig Frolic, from Antigua. And unless we can get a rope to them they're all gone together, for the wreck will break up with the flood-tide. I'd give a year of my life for a rocket!"

Anstice stood still a moment; and as I glanced at her, she looked like one of the frozen corpses tossing in the angry water at our feet. Then she turned and ran to the house, as if she feared something would make her halt; and when she came out she had her great bow and a bunch of arrows, and Aunt Maria was bringing the box of bowstrings.

She strung the bow as she came running along, and though old Ben laughed scornfully, she told him imperiously she could, at any rate, do no harm. And taking a coil of cord, she stationed all of us in one long line, with open hands, across which she stretched the slender cord that she unwound, so that it lay unhindered, and could slip through our hands untangled; and old Ben began to see some wisdom, and to give her some directions. Then Anstice fastened one end of the little light cord to her arrow, her best and firmest arrow, and she threw off her hood and shawl, and stood bending her bow a moment, and then she lifted it and pulled the string.

I never can recall that sight without a shiver and a shudder, it was so beautiful and so sublime, as she stood there, her lovely head thrown back, and all her bright hair streaming, and sent off that arrow to save the life of the man who had destroyed her lover and all her peace. She looked like a great avenging angel, and the twanging of that bowstring rung in my ears above the sound of the surf, even while that cord was slipping across my hands, as across all the others, so fast it scorched the skin. And the arrow flew up into the blue sky—far, far up, and over, and turned and fell and plunged into the sea beyond the brig; and they had caught the little cord there, and held it fast, and drew on board with it presently the somewhat stouter cord that old Ben had lashed to its other end. And when that stouter cord was in their hands, they drew in by that a hempen rope the size of your finger, and that was spliced at the other end to a great cable. And as swiftly as they could, with their frost-bitten fingers, and in the sea that broke over them still in such shooting splendor, they made the cable fast; and with loops about their waist slipped over the cable to prevent their being washed away, hand over hand they clambered to the land.

Two had already passed along before it was the turn of him who wore the Scotch cap; and watching him, we saw him suddenly push before him another, whose muffled face we had not seen, and himself help to lash round the cable the rope that held him. And when old Ben and his fellows caught this last-comer, and passed him up the bluff, to be sent along with the other rescued ones to our house, almost dead, but, thank God, not quite—Anstice, stooping over, and crying out with a great voice of love, had her arms about Ralph again! And as for all the rest of us, and of that crew, what a Thanksgiving we had!

USEFUL RECIPES.

GRIDDLE CAKES.—Melt in three pints of new milk one table-spoonful of lard. When cool, stir in flour to the consistency of ordinary griddle cakes, and beat hard five or ten minutes. Add salt, and break in the yolk and white of one egg not previously beaten; beat lightly, and stir in one tea-cupful of good home-made yeast. This quantity is sufficient for eight persons. In winter, put to rise just after breakfast for tea, and keep moderately warm. In summer, commence about ten o'clock, and keep rather cool.

PARKER HOUSE ROLLS.—Boil one pint of milk, and allow it to become milk-warm. Cut finely into two quarts of sifted flour two scant table-spoonfuls of lard, and stir in half a table-spoonful of salt. Line the sides and bottom of a crock with the flour, making a deep cavity in the centre. Stir into the milk a quarter of a tea-cupful of white sugar, and a scant tea-cupful of good home-made yeast. Pour into the crock, cover with flour, and let it rise. Work when light, and allow it to rise again; then mould, and, after standing about two hours, bake. At first let the oven be rather slack, and increase the heat gradually; it should bake half an hour. In summer, when some of the dough is placed in the refrigerator or on ice, it will keep a day or two. The sheet-iron tins for baking cakes are admirable for these rolls. Cut them in squares the size of the length of the divisions, spread a very little melted butter over the surface, fold over, and lay in the compartments. In baking in an ordinary pan cut them round, about half an inch thick, put on a very little butter, fold over, and put to rise.

CHOCOLATE KISSES.—Beat until light the whites of two eggs. Add slowly twenty-four tea-spoonfuls of flour sugar, and when smooth and stiff enough to take shape, four table-spoonfuls of grated chocolate (Baker's) and half a tea-spoonful of extract of vanilla. Bake as ordinary kisses, on a board.

COCOA-NUT KISSES.—Remove the rind from one small cocoa-nut, or half of a large one, grate it, and put over a range or stove until perfectly dry, which will be in about twelve hours. Beat until perfectly light the whites of four eggs, and add slowly, beating all the time, half a pound of flour sugar. Beat this mixture for an hour, or until light and smooth as plain kisses, and add a table-spoonful of lemon juice. Then stir in the cocoa-nut very lightly, bake on a board for kisses (described in a previous number of the Bazar), and remove from the oven when slightly browned and firm, which will be in about fifteen minutes. Slip off the paper, put two together, and place on a plate to cool; they will crisp in cooling. The great secret is to have the cocoa-nut perfectly dry; it should be like a chip, and seem to be entirely dried up; if the least damp, the kisses will be oily, flat, and tough.

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

BY F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER XVII.

IN DANGER.

THE man who in his zeal had adventured into Potter's Court did not betray, by any change of feature, his sense of the danger which was hanging over him. It was not an enviable position, but his coolness did not desert him. He looked steadily toward the two men in the doorway, and calculated their strength and weight against his own, and the extra odds that might be lurking on the dark landing-place and staircase.

Had it not been for the clanging of the bolts below, and for the careful locking up of the house, he would have been disposed to regard the arrival of Thomas Eastbell and his companion in a friendly spirit, despite the scowls with which they favored him, and the anxious faces of the women. He was standing by the fire-place, and he glanced down for any weapon of defense that might come in handy if the gentlemen in the house grew disputatious; but the fire-irons were missing, and there was only his own natural strength to rely upon, if necessary.

"Hanged if I didn't think so!" exclaimed Thomas Eastbell, alias Vizzobini, of the crowned-head patronage department. "So this is why you have been creeping about the Saxe-Gotha, is it? Well, what have I done, that you come into my crib in this way? Now you've found me out, what have you got to say? What the blazes have you got to say?" he roared forth in a louder key.

"That you keep too big a fire for the time of year, and that it isn't good for your healths," said Reuben, in a quiet tone of voice. "I have been telling Miss Eastbell so."

"What's the fire to do with you? You don't send in the coals and coke to make it up, do you? There ain't a law against a man having as much fire as he chooses, if he can pay for it. You ain't put yourself out of the way to come to Potter's Court to tell us that?"

"I have come to Potter's Court to see your sister."

"Well, that's uncommon kind of you!" he answered, ironically.

"Tom," said Sarah, at this juncture, "this is Mr. Culwick—young Mr. Culwick—our second cousin. You have heard me speak of him. You must not attempt in any way to interfere with him."

"You shut up! Hasn't he interfered with me?" snarled forth her brother; "hasn't he been dodging after me for the last three days?"

"He has been trying to find me."

"What business has he with you? Why can't he mind his own business, and let you alone?" cried Tom. "What's this second-cousin cove to us? What good is he? What notice has he ever taken of us till now? Damme! I don't believe he's a cousin at all, but an infernal policeman trying to work up a case against people more honest than hisself."

"I don't ask you to believe any thing," said Reuben.

"After telling me to-night that you'd come to see me perform, I shouldn't think you would! No, the cousin dodge won't do for me," he added; "I'm not likely to swallow that yarn. What's your little game?"

"I came to help your sister."

"Oh! that's it.—Eh?"

The interrogative was addressed to the man looking over his shoulder, who had touched his arm and whispered in his ear, keeping his eyes fixed upon Reuben meanwhile.

"My friend remarks," said Mr. Eastbell, with a grim smile upon his countenance as he addressed Reuben once more, "that if you have come to help the family, perhaps you will be kind enough to prove your words by doing the handsome to us poor people."

"You mean give you money?"

"We are thundering poor," said Tom.

"So am I."

"We are out of luck, and you are here to help us."

"To help Sarah Eastbell, if she will."

"To help all of us or none—we share and share alike in Potter's Court."

"Then, gentlemen, I am sorry that I can not help you."

"But you must," growled forth the man in the background who had recently whispered to Tom Eastbell; "you've walked in without leave after the gal, and you'll pay your footing before you go away."

An awful blood-curdling oath closed this assertion.

"I think not," said Reuben Culwick.

"Then you'll have to stop," cried the man. "The house is locked up for the night, and we can't afford to part with you—can we, mate?"

"No, we can't," answered Thomas Eastbell.

"Am I to understand that I'm a prisoner?" inquired Reuben, sternly.

"You're to understand nothing but that you've come here of your own free-will, and that it ain't convenient to unlock the house again to-night," said Tom. "We don't know what you've come for, what you've seen to make a case of, or what story you may trump up to-morrow to lug some innersent people off to prison."

"You've taken up your lodging, and you can't go without paying for it," said the other man; "that's the law, fair and straight, you know, in any court. So pay up, if you mean well."

"Ingenious," said Reuben, shrugging his broad shoulders; "but I have nothing to give away."

"There's men down stairs who say you're a spy on them," said Tom, in further explanation, "and they're Irish, and soon riled. So help me," he added, in a confidential tone, "if I would answer for your life if you stop here much longer. They're awful chaps, I swear!"

Reuben smiled incredulously.

"I am not afraid of them."

"Ask my sister. As you're dead nuts on her, p'r'aps you'll take her word.—Sally," he said, "will the Petersons stand as much of this man's cheek as I have?"

"They will not come up here!" cried Sarah, in alarm.

"They're sitting on the stairs waiting," said Tom, "and they will know all about this fellow. They are as sure as I am that he's a detective!"

"You have told them so!" said Sarah, indignantly.

"P'r'aps I have, and p'r'aps I haven't," answered her brother. "And now you and Soph just move out of here—we can't come to terms with women in the room. The gentleman will be much more reasonable when we are all men of business together. Do you hear?" he yelled, as a want of alacrity in responding to his summons disturbed the last fragment of self-possession that was left him.

Mrs. Eastbell rose to comply with her husband's request, but Sarah darted to the window of the room, and threw it open.

"What the devil now?" exclaimed her brother, as the cold air rushed in, and Mrs. Eastbell, taken aback by it, began to cough herself to pieces.

"There's mischief meant," cried Sarah. "I sha'n't leave this window while Mr. Culwick remains, and I will scream my heart out if you touch him!—This is a dreadful house, Sir," she said to Reuben, "with dreadful men in it. Be on your guard."

"Come back from that window!" roared her brother.

"I will do nothing of the kind," cried Sarah, standing there erect and defiant; "till Mr. Culwick is allowed to quit this place I'll not move away."

"Don't you see how you're making your sister-in-law cough, you brute?" said Thomas Eastbell. "If we were the Forty Thieves, you couldn't make more fuss. Why—"

He was sidling, step by step, toward his sister as he spoke, when Reuben Culwick crossed the room in one stride, and thrust him forcibly away, before his panther-like spring could fasten on her. It was a bold move, assuming the offensive in this fashion, but Reuben had grown angry at restraint, and it was the time to act, or never. Thomas Eastbell, despite his athletic profession, was a slight man, with an undeveloped physique, and no match for the strength of the honest young fellow who had confronted him thus unceremoniously. Reuben's thrust sent him staggering with violence against his friend, who, taken off his guard, received Tom's bullet head between his eyes, and fell backward into the passage with Tom on the top of him.

The sudden change in the condition of affairs approximated so closely to burlesque that a short sharp laugh escaped our hero as the men tumbled over each other. Still, it was a crisis; he had thrown down the gauntlet, and must face the result. The clear doorway suggested a temporary expedient, and he closed the door quickly, locked it with the key which he knew was on the inner side, and set his foot against the lower portion of the wood-work.

"There'll be murder done now," said Mrs. Eastbell, wringing her hands. "Oh, you fool, to come to this place! Call out you'll give 'em money, or they can have your watch—say something! They're coming up the stairs!"

"Who are they?" asked Reuben, sternly now.

Mrs. Eastbell did not answer, but Sarah whispered,

"Coiners!"

CHAPTER XVIII.

ON DEFENSE.

REUBEN began to consider his position with a greater degree of seriousness, although his courage did not in any way desert him. That it would be a fight for life now he did not doubt, for the house was full from roof to basement of desperate men, with whom life might be of little value in comparison with the secret of their nefarious trade. If he could disappear without any fuss, it would be better for the welfare of the community at Potter's Court; and he had set them all at defiance, and would betray them if allowed to leave the premises.

He could hear the trampling rush of heavy feet up the stairs, and the low oaths and curses of the men whom he had left on their backs on the landing-place, and then the door creaked and shook with the heavy pressure of shoulders from without.

Sarah Eastbell was as good as her word. Her watchful dark eyes had observed the door vibrating, and a scream of extraordinary shrillness and volume startled the echoes of Potter's Court, and welled forth into the narrow street beyond.

"Oh! don't, Sally—it's only their fun, perhaps," cried Mrs. Eastbell; but Sally, excited by the proximity of danger, screamed again with fifty horse-power, and then swept from the window-sill a whole collection of flower-pots that had held the geraniums and fuchsias of the last tenant, and which descended with a tremendous crash on to the paved footway below. The pressure against the door ceased, as though the people in the house had stopped to listen; the windows of other houses in Potter's Court began opening rapidly; there were voices shouting out innumerable questions; there were three or four shrill whistles, and then the ominous crack of a rattle, followed by another in response, and at a little distance.

"You are safe," said Sarah; "the police are coming."

"You have brought it all upon us, Sally!" cried Mrs. Eastbell, bursting into tears; "it's all your wicked temper and willfulness. We shall go to prison—every one of us."

"Mr. Culwick will not say a word to add to any misery here, I'm sure," said Sarah, meaningly.

The court was full of noise now, amidst which were heard rough peremptory voices asking questions, and receiving a grand chorus of explanation; but in the house, and beyond the door which Reuben had locked, was the stillness of the dead. Presently the street door below was unfastened in response to solemn knocks without, and then the ponderous unmistakable boots of the metropolitan force were heard clamping up the stairs. Reuben unlocked the room door, and Thomas Eastbell, white as a ghost, crawled in on his hands and knees, took a harlequin's dive into bed, and drew the tattered coverlet to his chin. The burly figures of three policemen were in the room an instant or two afterward: the representatives of the force never went singly to Potter's Court when a dispute was raging among its inhabitants.

"Now, then, what's the row?" said the principal spokesman. "Who's been trying to throw the other out of window?"

"Who's been melting lead?" inquired another, whom the peculiar nature of the atmosphere had impressed as it had done Reuben at an earlier hour.

No one had been throwing another out of window, whined forth Mrs. Eastbell; no one had been melting lead or any thing. They had had a little wrangle as it got late, and just as their cousin was a-going home, the flower-pots somehow gave way and fell into the court, which frightened the gal at the window, who began to scream. The policeman who had first spoken listened to this explanation with a stolid stare upon his countenance; the second official, being of an inquisitive turn of mind, opened all the drawers and cupboards, and examined their contents; the third man inspected Mr. Thomas Eastbell, as he lay recumbent, and inconvenienced him by giving him the full benefit of the glare from a bull's-eye lantern on his face.

"Come, that sham won't do, young feller," said he. "Is there any complaint to make?"

No one had any complaint to make.

"Has any one been robbed, or threatened, or maltreated?" asked the first policeman, looking hard at Reuben.

No one answered.

"Who are you?" asked the policeman, abruptly, of our hero.

"Oh! I'm the cousin," answered Reuben.

"You've nothing to say?"

"Nothing."

"Are you going to stop here?"

"Thank you, no," said Reuben; "I was just thinking of getting home. We have had a little dispute, certainly, and Tom and I—this is my cousin Tom, who performs at the Saxe-Gotha—got to high words and a playful scramble—and that's all."

"Yes—that's all," asserted Tom, with alacrity, "and it's a precious little to come into a man's house for—three of you, too—and rummage over his things."

"What's your name?"

"Vizzobini."

"From the country?"

"From Rome."

"I should like to know where this smell of lead comes from," said the inquisitive policeman again.

Reuben had crossed to Sarah.

"Here is your chance still. Will you leave this place?"

"Not yet," she answered; "not till Tom's safe."

"Tom's a scoundrel."

"He is my brother."

"But when I am gone, they—"

"They will not hurt me," she said, with a forced smile. "I shall not come to any harm. Go now, please."

"Shall I ever see you again?—or do you pass away from me, as from the poor old woman you have left alone in St. Oswald's?"

It was a reproof, but he intended it.

"You will see me again soon," she answered, with a strange look toward him.

"Good-by, then."

"Good-by."

Reuben went out of the room, and the policemen followed him down stairs, and into the court, strewn with innumerable fragments of flower-pots, which were crunched beneath their heavy heels.

"Blessed if you mightn't have smashed somebody with your larks," said the observant policeman, looking up at the window from which the avalanche had descended.

"It was rather rough play," answered Reuben.

"Have you been there before?" asked the first policeman.

"No."

"You'll not go there again, cousin or no cousin, if you have any thing to lose."

"Which I have not."

"I don't think you're one of the lot," said the policeman, eying him closely, when they were up the steps and under the gas lamp, "but I shall remember you, my man."

"Thank you."

And then Reuben Culwick, somewhat ungrateful, left the triumvirate who had arrived in good time to his rescue. But he could not explain, and it seemed the better policy to be silent for Second-cousin Sarah's sake. She had wished it—and it was she who had saved him from danger. He had to think again of the way to save her, now that he had become more than ever resolved to get her away from Potter's Court.

CHAPTER XIX.

ATONEMENT.

REUBEN CULWICK did not attempt in any way to account for his late hours to the inmates of Hope Lodge. He was the master of his own actions, which no one, he felt, had any right to criticise. Hence, with this impression on his mind, the deep reveries of Lucy Jennings, and the studious stares of her brother, who, when not busy with his fire-works, appeared to be taking him in far too intently, became a source of irritation to him.

It had impressed itself upon the Jenningses' mind, brother and sister's, that he, Reuben Culwick, was not so steady as he used to be—that he had come back from Worcester a changed man. He had been at the Saxe-Gotha Gardens more than once, and John Jennings knew that he was interested in a girl in a black and white cotton dress, for he had not only made inquiries concerning her, but had warned him not to tell Lucy. Then he was eccentric, and kept late hours; he had become reticent when people wanted him talkative; a portion of his bright cheery nature had suddenly vanished, and he had grown wondrously thoughtful, as men will do when their consciences are ill at ease.

Neither John nor Lucy Jennings thought that Reuben Culwick had his second cousin on his mind, and that it was his own generous concern for her that had turned him grave of late days. And why Second-cousin Sarah should oppress his mind in this way he could hardly account for himself, for she seemed scarcely grateful for his interest, and in some respects to be opposed to it. He exercised no influence over her; she was on the wrong road, and no persuasions of his had power to turn her back. She was a relation certainly, but then so was Tom Eastbell, and the old woman in the almshouse of St. Oswald's. Was it her helplessness, hemmed round by the adverse circumstances of life, and through which it seemed impossible to break? Was it the forlornness of her youth, and the good traits of character that seemed to fight hard in her for fair play? It was not a romantic interest, although there had been a certain amount of romance in the meetings and partings between them. She was only a "bit of a girl," and there was not the ghost of a tender sentiment inspiring him, he was certain. She had been so obstinate and self-willed at times, too, that he had felt disposed to shake her, but still there was an intense longing to save her, and a sad feeling, almost of despair, at his own inability to accomplish it.

He took no one into his counsel; if he had small faith in himself, he had less in any body else, and, for reasons which he will explain presently, he kept the story of his discovery of his cousin, and of the adventure which had followed it, a secret. He went his own course, and he waited and watched for Sarah Eastbell still; and even Tots knew that there was something different in the little world they shared together, by his more constant absence from home, and by his leaving her to Aunt Lucy's care and guidance, which, however well carried out, was accompanied by more scoldings and lectures than even Tots remembered suffering from at any period anterior to this.

John Jennings was suffering also from the same cause. His sister Lucy's temper was certainly not improving; every day she was becoming harder and grimmer, more uncharitable and more suspicious; and thus the change in Reuben Culwick seemed to work its change on the household in its turn. John set down his sister's acerbity, and her bad habit of slamming the doors behind her, to her consciousness that all was not well with his Saxe-Gotha Gardens account, and he essayed to render matters more cheerful by giving highly colored versions of the position of affairs, which Lucy did not respond to, and probably did not believe in, judging by the stony apathy with which she listened to his statements. Reuben was the first to comment upon the change in Lucy Jennings. He was quick enough to note her taciturnity and stolidity, although unaware that he had been extra grave and a trifle mysterious himself; and when it came to bringing in the breakfast tray without a word, setting it down with a bang that jarred on his nerves, and leaving the room without so much as a "good-morning," he thought it was quite time to make a few inquiries on his own account.

Hosted by Google

"LUCY JENNINGS BURST FORTH WITH HER CATALOGUE OF WRONGS."

"Is any thing the matter, Lucy?" he asked at last one morning.

"Any thing the matter!" answered Lucy, at once; "with you, do you mean?"

"No, with you."

"I'm not very well, but I don't know that I am worse than usual. Why?"

"You don't seem quite so lively, that's all," said Reuben. "I was afraid that you and John had had a little difference, and I was going to volunteer to act as mediator."

"Thank you," was the answer, "John and I understand each other very well without any mediation. We have not quarreled—we never do quarrel."

"You haven't heard any bad news?"

"Not at present. We're waiting."

"Waiting for bad news! Well, Lucy," he added, with one of his old laughs, "I would wait till it came before giving way."

Lucy saw her opportunity, and being a woman, dashed at it.

"It has come, though we don't know what it means."

"Eh—how's that?"

Lucy Jennings sat down in the chair nearest to her lodger, and burst forth with her catalogue of wrongs, making amends for all past reserve in one breath.

"It has come to you. You're not the man you have been. You keep away from home too much—you have been seen at low places of amusement—you're going wrong—you—you—you never tell us any thing," cried Lucy, passionately.

"Yes, I have been seen at low places of amusement," said Reuben, quietly; "and my hours of return to Hope Lodge are somewhat irregular at present. And so I am going wrong, Lucy?"

"You are not doing what is right."

"That's frank," said Reuben, dryly.

"You must be ashamed of something, or you would tell us," said this plain-speaking young woman. "There's always a bad reason for hustling the truth into a corner, and hiding your life away from those who are anxious about it."

"You are very kind to be anxious; but—"

"I never said that I was anxious," cried Lucy, "only that there were those whom you were disturbing by your change of life—by your strange ways. You are neglecting your work—there's that paper been lying on your desk untouched for the last three days—you don't go to the office, because letters from the Trumpet come to you. I know the seal. John says you're often at the Saxe-Gotha—that last night you were asking the waiter why Vizzobini had given up performing—and altogether you're restless, ill at ease, unhappy."

"You will excuse me, Lucy," he said, more gravely and coldly than he was in the habit of addressing her, "but is it your place to tell me of it, even in this irrelevant and insane fashion?"

"If no one else will—yes," cried Lucy, stoutly. "I never saw any one going wrong—by ever so little—but what I felt it my place, my duty, to try and set the sinner right again."

"Yes, but you jump too rapidly at conclusions, after the habit of enthusiasts. I'm not a sinner—that is, no more of a miserable specimen than I was three weeks ago."

"Why did you ask John about the girl in the striped dress at the Saxe-Gotha—"

"Ah, the rascal has turned king's evidence, then!" cried our hero.

"Why did you ask him not to tell me?—why are you always at the gardens?—why had you the effrontery," she cried, with eyes ablaze now, "to ask that wretched, miserable girl to call here for you?"

"WHAT!" shouted Reuben, so forcibly that even Lucy was unprepared for his excitement, and jumped back in her chair some distance from him.

"What do you mean?" he continued; "who has been here? Speak out—don't glare at me, you suspicious, heartless, disagreeable woman! What girl called here for me?"

Lucy was very pale, but she held her ground against his rage, though she had never been a witness to it before. He had been always a pleasant man till this day, but now he was full of passion and, perhaps, hate of her. She could understand more clearly now why his quarrel with his father had been a bitter one.

"It was a girl in a striped cotton dress," said Lucy, with emphasis.

"Somewhat tall and thin, with great black eyes?"

"I didn't notice her eyes," said Lucy, aggravatingly; "she was a pert, insolent, miserably clad woman. She would not answer any of my questions, save that you had told her to call, and she grew impertinent at last."

"You sent her away?"

"Yes."

"You did not tell her that I should be home soon—ask her to call again—any thing?"

"She said that she would never come again."

"Because of your hardness and harshness?"

"Did you expect me to be civil to her?"

"Why not?"

"She carried effrontery and desperation in her face."

"It's a lie!" shouted Reuben Culwick. "You don't know what you are doing, what you have done, in your heartlessness."

"If I have stopped her coming, if I—"

"Don't say any more," cried Reuben, "for I can't listen to you. There was a soul to be saved, and you have wrecked it."

"No," said Lucy, growing paler still, "you don't mean—"

"I mean that that girl is my cousin, for whom you tried to obtain an honest place in life," he replied; "for whose salvation I have been struggling after my useless fashion."

"She is at Worcester."

"She left Worcester. There was a false charge against her; she could not meet it or account for it, and she ran away from home," said Reuben. "It was a false step, for she trusted a vagabond brother, and lost faith in herself; but she lived on in hope, for all that, and she kept strong amidst it all."

"And then?"

"And then I found her in London, and tried to save her from the evil that was surrounding her. She saved my life, perhaps, then, and rendered me forever her debtor. When there was a chance for her she was to come here. She came," he said, fiercely, "and you sent her away. How will you, with all your narrow views of charity, and God's mercy, and God's vengeance, answer for it, if you have cut from her the last thread which led her to a better life?"

Lucy Jennings was cowed by his reproaches, by his vehemence. Suspicious, awfully suspicious, as she was, she was still a religious woman, and the horror of having cast back a stubborn, willful nature on itself rose before her even in more terrible colors than he had painted it.

"Why—why didn't you tell me?" she gasped forth—"why didn't you trust me?"

"You are not to be trusted," said Reuben, remorselessly; "you would have believed the worst of her, until I could have proved how merciless you were. You are a woman, and you judge your sex as women will!"

"I will find her," said Lucy, very meekly now. "I will bring her back."

"It is impossible."

"I will tell her that I was wrong in my judgment. I will ask her pardon. You must not charge the loss of this girl to me."

"She will never return."

"Where did you see her last?"

"In Potter's Court."

"I know it—in the Walworth Road," said Lucy. "It is part of my mission to go among the people there. What is the number of the house?"

"Two."

"Where the Petersons live—the Irish people. I will go at once. Don't judge me too harshly, till I have made amends for my mistake," she pleaded.

"It is too late," said Reuben, gloomily; "the house was empty two days since. There were coiners in it, and the suspicion that I might betray them, or that the police were on the scent, led them to leave the premises."

"I will find them," said Lucy; "I am known. People trust me there, who know me better than you do," she added, almost disdainfully again.

"Why should they trust you?" asked Reuben, wonderingly.

"Because they understand me, because in the midst of crime and suffering I have been often at my best, and tried to do my best. Because I have been less suspicious and more in earnest there. I am not a good woman," she said, with a sudden abjectness once more predominant, "but God knows that I have tried hard to be good, and to forget self at times, amidst the misery I have moved in. I will find her, or" (with a hard expression on her countenance) "I will never come back again."

"That is an unwise threat, scarcely consistent with your duty to your brother."

"I have said it," answered Lucy; "I never break my word."

Lucy Jennings walked out of the room with her hands rigidly clasped together; in a few minutes afterward she had passed out of the house.

"Have I been too hard with her?" thought Reuben, looking after her. "Have I driven her from home? Is she quite right in her head, I wonder?"

Lucy Jennings was not quite right in that department, possibly, but she knew what she was about, and she was a woman of a strong determination. She had made a mistake, and her pride was abased. There was an atonement to make, and a woman to save, and in the midst of all the contrarieties of her singular character, a heart somewhat stony had been set in the right place. Lucy Jennings was not far wrong in her self-estimate—it was only amidst much privation, crime, and misery that she was at her best.

It was late, and when John Jennings and Reuben Culwick had taken counsel together, and had arrived at the conclusion that she would not return that night—when Tots, with the inconsistency of childhood, had begun to fret after her hard custodian—Lucy, stiff-backed and grim, came up the front garden, with a tall girl, who walked with difficulty, resting on her arm.

"Here's your second-cousin Sarah," she said to Reuben, in her old jerky manner, as the two women came into the house.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

CHALKED.

How I won my darling?
This is all the tale:
On the broad Atlantic
We were under sail.

Wide outspread, the water
Rippled in the light;
Swiftly on the quarter
Hove a sail in sight.

In its onward speeding
We, with eyes intent,
Every movement heeding,
Watched it as it went.

Soon it passed, and fleetly
Rosa darling flew;
"To the bow!" cried sweetly;
"There the better view."

Luckless victim! Smartly
Jack was to the fore,
Quick for fun, though partly
Bent on grog galore.

All absorbed he found her,
Lost to fee or fine;
Knelt, and deftly round her
Chalked a magic line.

By the circle bounded,
What might set her free?
Coin or kiss? Surrounded,
Smiled she then on me.

Like the prisoned starling,
Caught and ill at ease,
"Do," she cried—the darling!—
"Do unchalk me, please!"

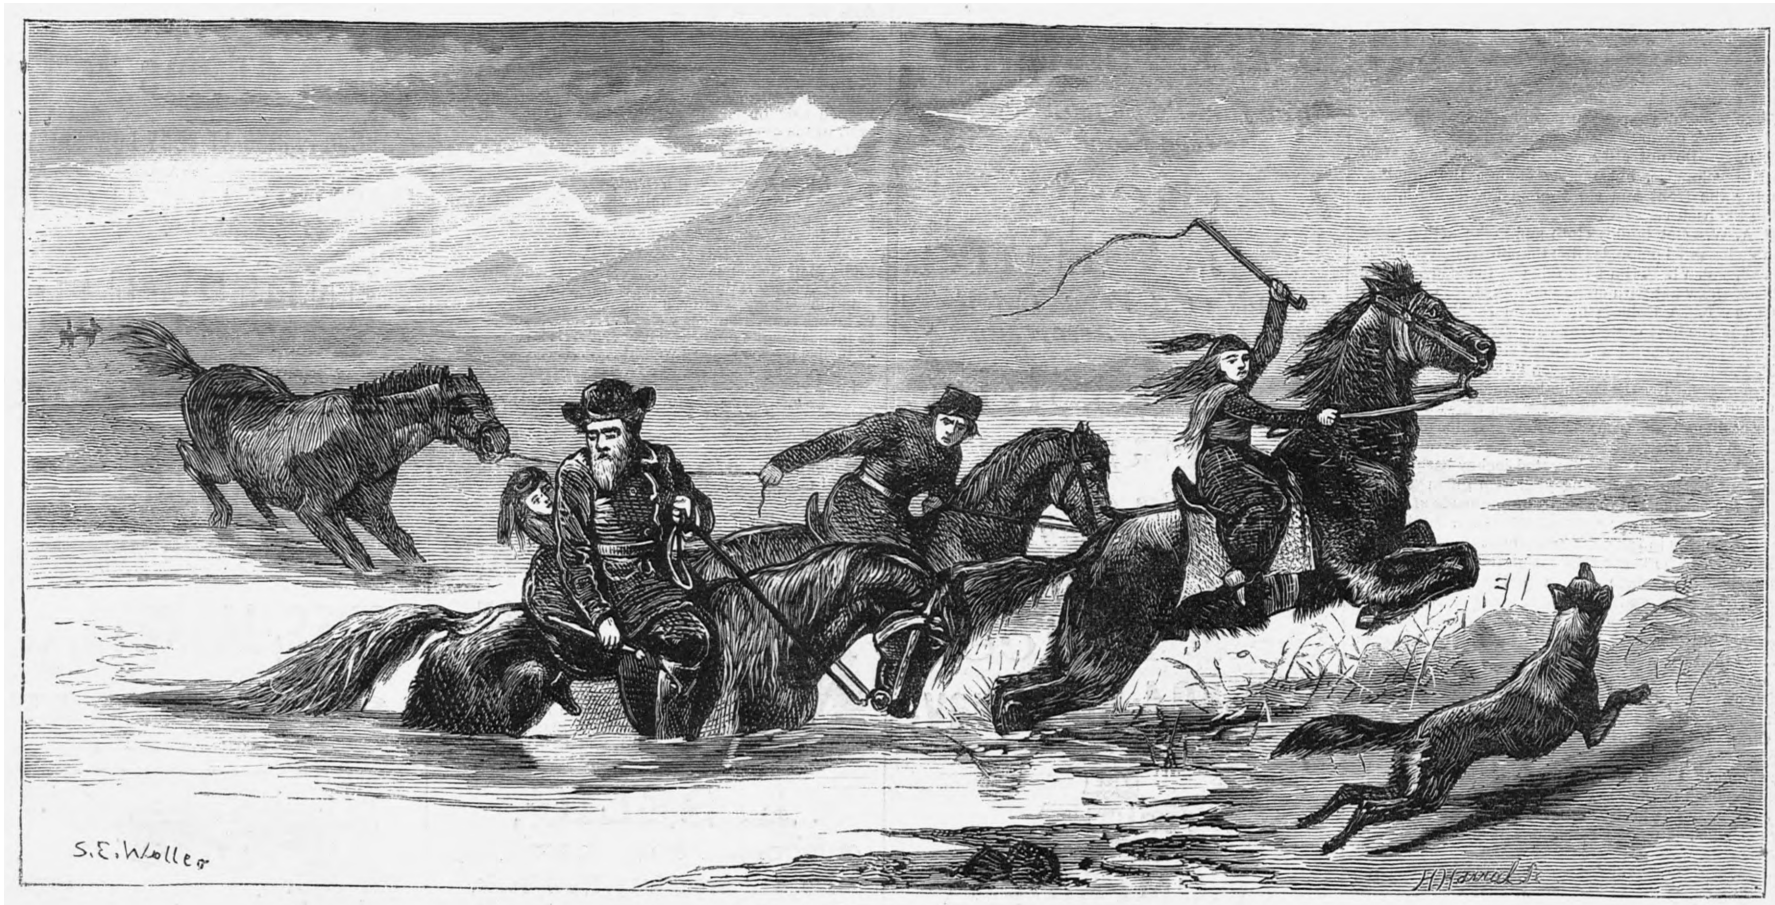
I obeyed, and won her—
Mine to have and hold
In a defter circle,
In a ring of gold.

"CHALKED."

Hosted by Google

AN ICELANDIC WEDDING.

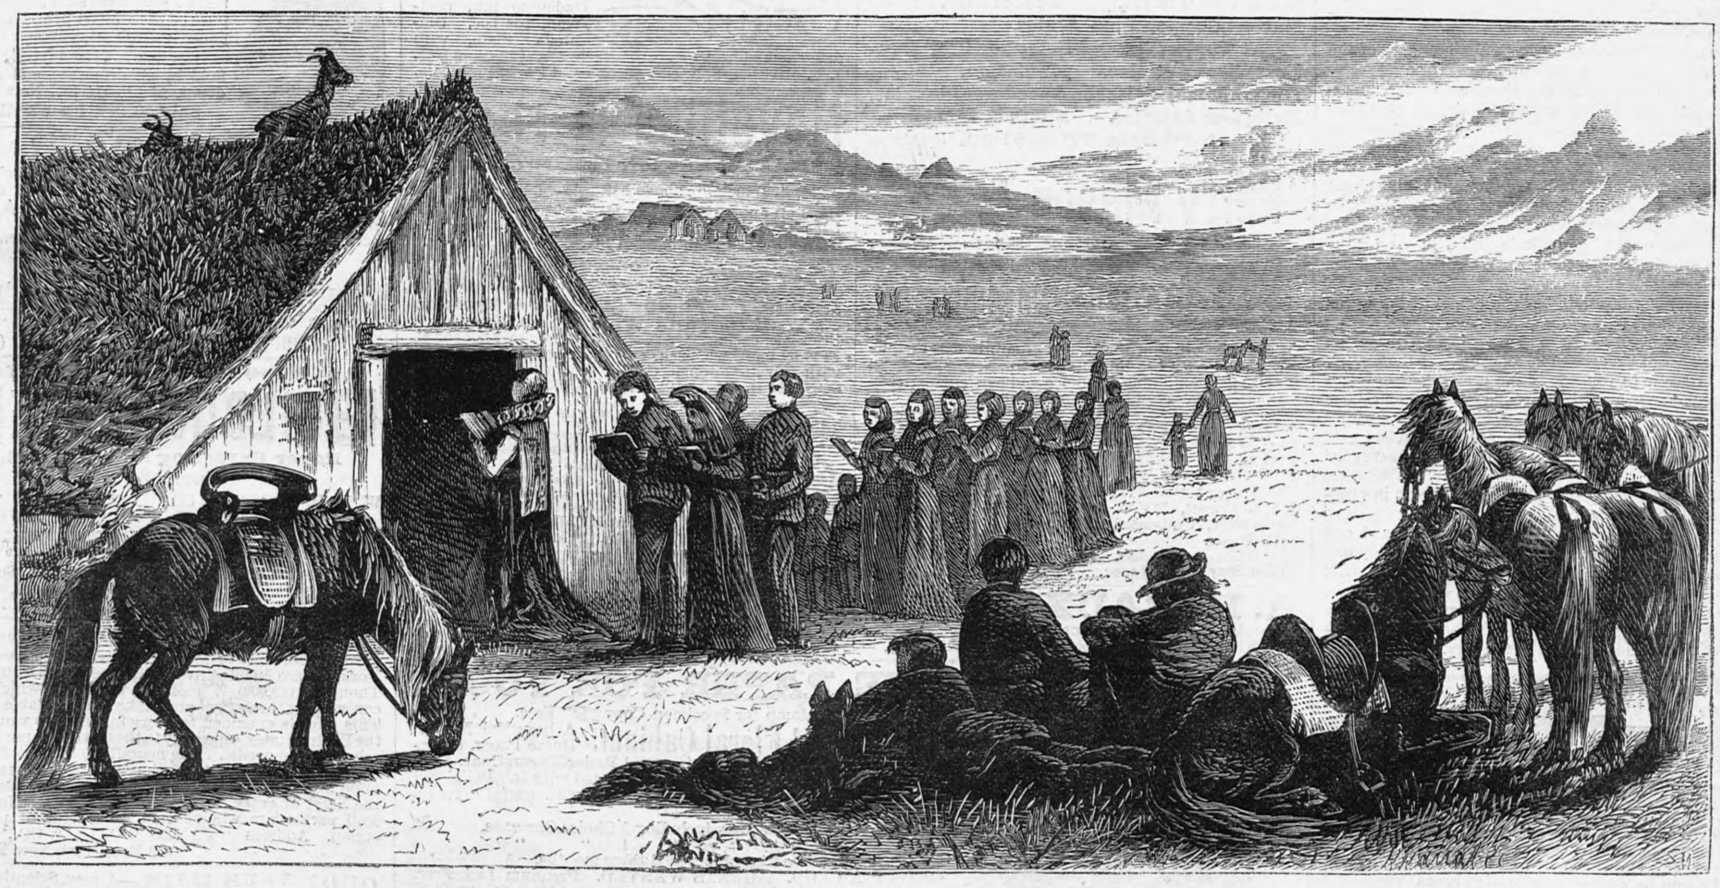


GOING TO MEET THE BRIDE.

THE BRIDE.

A BRIDE-MAID.

PRIEST.



THE WEDDING PROCESSION.

OUR sketches depict a wedding which recently took place in the little church of Kross, Iceland. These ceremonies are naturally rare in such a thinly peopled country, and the guests come from long distances (as much as sixty miles), and all on horseback. A horse often carries the father, his wife (astride), with a baby on her back, and a couple more youngsters. Some 200 horses were hobbled or turned loose round the church. The visitors, after sitting down on the grass to change their wet stockings, entered the house, whence, after imbibing sundry refreshments, they presently emerged, headed by the bride and bridegroom, and marched to the church, singing a dismal ditty. The company were dressed, as usual, in a kind of coarse black woolen cloth, the girls' dresses were very gay, having the skirts embroidered with ornamental foliage in blue and green, and the bodies worked with silver round the neck, wrists, and back. The bride wore a large white head-dress and long veil, studded with silver stars, and the priest was gorgeous in a crimson velvet robe and Elizabethan ruff. The ceremony was very long, but the congregation did not find it tedious, as they went out at intervals to take drinks and chat, besides which they took an enormous quantity of snuff. This did not enhance the solemnity of the scene, and the artist's gravity was completely upset when the clergyman stopped in the middle of his blessing to spit thrice with great velocity and accuracy into the middle of the nave.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CORRESPONDENT.—The double-breasted redingote pattern is suitable for your water-proof cloth.

URENA.—We do not execute such commissions.

CORDUROY.—The hair is again worn low in a single châtelaine braid behind, with a crown braid on top. The front is parted in the middle, not frizzed, but in broad waves, and put smoothly back under the braids.

M. S. B.—Cut your green poplin short, and wear it under a dark green or black redingote.

J. D. S.—Do not alter your black cashmere Marguerite polonaise, but merely change the draping, leaving the front and sides plain and smooth, and tying the back very full.

F. A. W.—Get tamise cloth and make with a loose double-breasted polonaise like that illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI. Trim with folds of the same. Have a black straw hat with crape trimmings.

CLARA L.—A Dolman or else an English walking jacket is the best design for your velvet wrap. Trim with jet galloon and black repped silk.

F. Y.—Read answer just given "Clara L."

MOURNING.—Use the Double-breasted Jockey Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI., for your cashmere, and trim with alternate folds of repped silk and cashmere.

NELL.—Use the double-breasted jockey basque pattern sent you for combining your two green dresses. Make the basque and over-skirt of one shade of green, the sleeves and lower skirt of the other. Alternate the two shades in folds for trimmings.

M. A. H.—The black brilliantine for a girl of fourteen should be made with a jockey basque, round apron over-skirt, and kilt-pleated lower skirt.

N. C. A.—Jet buttons are suitable for your basque. Covered buttons are still used, but are more moderate in size than those of last summer.

MARGARET.—Wear white, light blue, or black ties with your navy blue dress. If your blue is nearly black, you can also wear pale pink or buff.

OMAHA.—Have a thick silk cord around the skirt of your white poplin, and put lengthwise ruches down the front breadths. The basque must be long behind and the back of the skirt untrimmed.

J. W. H.—The bridegroom furnishes gloves for his groomsmen. In many cases he also orders the wedding-cards.

J. A. R.—Redingotes were originally intended for the street, but are so convenient that they are also worn in the house.

MRS. J. M.—Use black silk or else silk of the same red plum-color for trimming.

IDA M.—Put up the back hair in one thick châtelaine braid. Wave the front, and wear a ribbon fillet knotted on the left side.

A SUBSCRIBER.—For a model for a navy blue serge suit consult illustration on the first page of Bazar No. 45, Vol. VI., and read the New York Fashions of same paper.

KITTIE KROOK.—The plural of tableau is tableaux, pronounced as if spelled tab-lose.

SUBSCRIBER.—We have not yet published the pattern you wish, but may do so by-and-by.—Consult a pronouncing dictionary for the names about which you are in doubt.

IGNORAMUS.—Of course you should call on a bride to whose wedding you have been invited.

INQUIRER.—To abstain from taking the last piece on the dish when invited to do so is very ill-bred, as it implies that the vacancy can not be supplied.

CHEERIES.—In eating stone fruit a great diversity of fashion prevails. Some put the stones out of the mouth into the spoon, others cover the lips with the hand and drop the stones unseen into the palm, and others press out the stone with the fork or spoon without taking it into the mouth. The latter is certainly the daintiest method.

A. V. P.—Of course you can copy the patterns from the magazines. Stamping patterns and utensils are sold by numerous persons, as advertised in the Bazar and other journals. The prices vary according to circumstances.

M. N. B.—The gentleman should take the initiative in opening a correspondence and in exchanging photographs.

TUMA.—Address your letter to the secretary of the Cooper Union, Cooper Institute, New York.

MEDIA.—It is absolutely dishonest to offer an article which has already been published to an editor without stating the fact.—Velvet is best restored by steaming the back.—You will be likely to obtain the reeds at a basket store.

AN OLD ADMIRER.—We do not know any thing about the person you mention, who is certainly an unimportant personage in literature.

KATYDID.—Several periodicals club with us; for the details see their prospectuses. We furnish no other periodicals than our own.

ADA.—You can obtain back numbers of the Bazar from the publication office at ten cents per copy.

L. R.—Give your card to the person who opens the door, and who chances to be a member of the family, but a stranger to you. It is the easiest way of introducing yourself, and will prevent a mistake about your name.

A CORRESPONDENT.—Vim is a provincialism not found in the dictionaries, and signifying energy or force.

EDITH.—You had better address the bureau in question for a copy of its rules and regulations.

S. S. L.—We are unfamiliar with the poem, and can not tell you where you can find it. It is probably one of the many pretty ephemeral productions that drift out of sight, and are lost in the ocean of journalism.

ESCORT.—In walking with a lady always give her the wall, so as to shield her from the passers. The privilege of recognition belongs to the lady.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DEAFNESS AND CATARRH.—A Lady who had suffered for years from Deafness and Catarrh was cured by a simple Indian Remedy. Her sympathy and gratitude prompt her to send the recipe, free of charge, to any one similarly afflicted. Address MRS. M. CLARA LEGGETT, Jersey City, N. J.

FRENCH STAMPING MATERIALS, IN ANY quantity. Complete working samples sent free. W. J. CURRIER, Park Hotel, New York City.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS
502-504 Broadway,

Offer for the Season their entire Stock of

Ladies' Furs,

including a Very Extensive and Elegant Assortment of

Seal-Skin Furs,

in all Styles and Qualities, at greatly

Reduced Prices.

502-504 Broadway.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION
A WEEKLY PAPER FOR YOUNG PEOPLE AND THE FAMILY

THE COMPANION aims to be a favorite in every family—looked for eagerly by the young folks, and read with interest by the older. Its purpose is to interest while it amuses; to be judicious, practical, sensible; and to have really permanent worth, while it attracts for the hour.

It is handsomely illustrated, and has for contributors some of the most attractive writers in the country. Among these are

Edward Eggleston, Dr. I. I. Hayes,
Prof. Jas. DeMille, Louise C. Moulton,
Louisa M. Alcott, "Sophia May,"
Rebecca H. Davis, C. A. Stephens,
C. W. Flanders, Ruth Chesterfield,
S. S. Robbins, M. A. Denison.

Its reading is adapted to the old and young; is very varied in its character; sprightly and entertaining. It gives

Stories of Adventure, Stories of Home and School Life,
Letters of Travel, Tales, Poetry,
Editorials upon Current Topics, Selections for Declamation,
Historical Articles, Anecdotes, Puzzles,
Biographical Sketches, Religious Articles, Facts & Incidents.

☞ Subscription Price, $1 50. Specimen copies sent free. Address,

Perry Mason & Co.,
41 Temple Place, Boston, Mass.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

PARIS NOVELTIES ☞ JUST RECEIVED.

The Elegant "PANSY" Corset, the GRACEFUL Corset, NEW BUSTLES, Embroidered Underwear, Undressed Kid Gloves, Fine Fans, and Gift Goods.

J. C. DEVIN,
Under Sturtevant House, 1192 Broadway.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND

Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

HAIR!!!

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street,
Branch Store, 345 Sixth Avenue,

Between 21st & 22d Streets, begs leave to call the attention of the ladies to his complete and superb stock of Human Hair Goods for the Fall, comprising all the Latest Styles, manufactured of the best quality of French hair only, without any intermixing whatsoever, of his own importation and manufacture.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

RETAILED AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

☞ I can offer to the Public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors. All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches.....$1 and upward.
Finest Quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed,
18 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....$5 00
22 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 6 00
26 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 8 00
32 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, naturally Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

BEAUTIFY THE SKIN

BY USING LAIRD'S
"Bloom of Youth."
This harmless & delightful toilet preparation will remove all discolorations and blemishes from the skin, leaving it SOFT, CLEAR, SMOOTH, and BEAUTIFUL.
SOLD AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

A. SELIG,
(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),
No. 813 Broadway, New York,

Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.

Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN SUPPORTER

FOR LADIES And Gentlemen

☞ Has no WHALEBONES or STEEL RIBS; no ELASTIC or RUBBER BANDS; is easily adjusted, and fits the form perfectly. Send for circular. D. C. HALL & CO., No. 44 West Broadway, N. Y., Sole Agents for Smith's Perforated Buckskin Under-garments, and Sibley's Patent Dress Shields.

For Marking Clothing.

A Stencil Plate, like cut, with brush and indelible ink, postpaid, for 50c. Umbrella Plate, with name and address, ready to attach, 35c. Circulars free. J. F. MARSH, S. E. cor. Second and Dock, Phila., Pa.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

DRESS ELEVATOR.

Instantly changing Skirt from Train to Walking, and Walking to Train.

Price 35c. each. Three free by mail for $1.
Free by mail, 40c. each. 1 doz. free by mail for $3, with full directions. Call or send to W. H. JOHNSON, 267 Broadway, N. Y. AGENTS WANTED.

CLARKE'S NEW METHOD PIANO-FORTE.

HAS NEVER BEEN EQUALED.
Teaches practical piano playing and theoretical music thoroughly.
Clarke's New Method for the PIANO-FORTE carries the pupil by easy gradations to the highest practical results.
Sent by Mail, Price $3.75
LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

REDUCED.

Union Adams & Co.

ARE OFFERING AT VERY LOW PRICES

HOSIERY AND GLOVES,

UNDERWEAR,

Shirts & Collars,

HANDKERCHIEFS,

SUSPENDERS,

ROBES, JACKETS, &c.

637 BROADWAY.

VICK'S FLORAL GUIDE FOR 1874.

☞ 200 Pages, 500 Engravings, and Colored Plate.

Published Quarterly, at 25 cents a year. First No. for 1874 just issued. A German edition at same price. Address JAMES VICK, Rochester, N.Y.

$250,000 Hair Sale!!

Endorsing the plan adopted by large Dry Goods firms, and to keep my factory hands employed (and to raise cash to pay them,) during the Winter, I reduce price of HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES to cost of Hair and workmanship, to give all an opportunity to buy just what is needed for present and all fashions. Don't delay. ☞ A useful holiday present.

☞ No Crimped Hair in, Solid, FIRST QUALITY, and Warranted NOT DYED Hair:

2¼	oz.,	28	in.	long;	former price	$6 00;	reduced to	$4 80
2¾	"	30	"	"	"	7 50;	"	6 00
3	"	32	"	"	"	9 00;	"	7 20
4	"	32	"	"	"	12 00;	"	9 60
5	"	32	"	"	"	15 00;	"	12 00
6	"	32	"	"	"	18 00;	"	14 40

Sent prepaid on receipt of price, or C. O. D. by express, with privilege to examine. CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity Street, New York.

Ask your druggist for Peckham's Leucothea, the very best preparation for beautifying the complexion. Try it. You will always use it. Price $1 per Bottle.

A SINGLE APPLICATION OF BARRY'S
Pearl Cream
turns the darkest skin as clear and pure as the whitest pearls, and imparts a fresh appearance to the COUNTENANCE.
Sold by all druggists, and at the depot, 26 Liberty St., New York.
Only 50 Cents per Bottle.

THREE PAIR

Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, and Dress-Trimmings. A splendid Black Dress Silk, $1 25 yard. Heavy Black Silk Velvet, only $2 yard—worth double. Samples sent free.

FINE FURS

of every description at less than manufacturers' prices. ☞ Send for Price-List. All goods selected therefrom sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

ALUMINOUS AND ORNAMENTAL
BUILDING PAPER
Paper Carpeting and Oil Cloth.
Send for Samples and Price-List.

W. H. H. ROGERS & CO., 2 & 3 College Place, N. Y. F. N. DAVIS & CO., Beloit, Wis.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 39 East 33d St., N. Y.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

CURL YOUR HAIR.—A new Scientific Discovery. It can be done in 5 minutes. Particulars free. Address SOUTHWESTERN AGENCY, Carthage, Mo.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

FRENCH EMBROIDERIES AND STAMPING.—V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N. Y. Lingerie, Ladies' and Babies' Trousseau. Direct importation. Finest stock on hand. Orders filled with care. Specialty of Monograms. MACHINES and Perforated PATTERNS.

LADIES! JUST THE PAPER FOR YOU!!!

Send stamp for Specimen Copy ☞ Free.

The Ladies' Floral Cabinet. A beautiful NEW Home Paper, devoted to Flowers, Window Gardening, and Parlor Decorations. Exquisitely illustrated. Ladies will be delighted with it. Delightful home pictures of society and Amusements, with useful hints on housekeeping and Elegancies.

Price $1 50 per year, including 3 Choice Chromos.
" $1 25 " " " 1 " "
Price 25 cents on trial three months.

GET UP A CLUB. AGENTS WANTED. Premium List Free.

Window Gardening. A New Book, superbly illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Bulbs, and Flowers for in-doors, with handsome illustrations of Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Sent, postpaid, by mail. Book Stores have it.

The Ladies' Cabinet Initial Note-Paper. Rose or Violet Tinted; your own initial. Handsome present. Highly perfumed. Attractive Chromo on each Box. Price 50c. a Box. 100 PAPERS AT CLUB RATES. Send Stamp for List Free. Address

"LADIES' FLORAL CABINET,"
5 Beekman Street, Room 5, New York.

Hosted by Google

CARPETS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

Are offering a Large Assortment of

BEST QUAL. 5-FRAME ENG. BODY BRUSSELS,
At $1 75 per Yard.

BEST QUALITY ENG. TAPESTRY BRUSSELS,
At $1 25 per Yard.

UPHOLSTERY DEPARTMENT.

FURNITURE AND DRAPERY MATERIALS.
LACE CURTAINS.
SHADES, CORNICES, &c.

N. B.—Churches, Steamers, and Hotels furnished at WHOLESALE PRICES, and at short notice.

PRICES GREATLY REDUCED!

LADIES', CHILDREN'S, & INFANTS' OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT.

MISSES' IRISH POPLIN AND SERGE SUITS.
" BLUE & GRAY FLANNEL SAILOR SUITS.
LADIES' SILK & CASHMERE MORNING ROBES.
LADIES' UNDERCLOTHING, our own and Paris manufacture.
OUTFITS, every description, ready-made and to order.
FRENCH AND GERMAN CORSETS, &c.

FUR DEPARTMENT.

SEAL SACQUES, MUFF, BOA, and CAP to match.
" " " " trimmed with Otter.
LADIES' and GENTS' SEAL CAPS, GLOVES, AND COLLARS.
SABLE, MINK, CHINCHILLA, ERMINE, BLACK MARTEN, and other sets.
FUR TRIMMINGS.
FUR ROBES.
LADIES' FUR-LINED CARRIAGE CLOAKS, &c.

N. B.—The above goods are all this season's purchases, and are offered much BELOW IMPORTATION COST. An examination solicited.

INDIA SHAWLS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.
HAVE OPENED
STRIPED INDIA SQUARE SHAWLS, from $20 and upward.
FILLED CENTRE SQUARE SHAWLS, from $125 and upward.

BROADWAY, cor. Nineteenth Street.

STERN BROTHERS,

Sixth Ave. and Twenty-Third St.,

Continue to offer this week DECIDED BARGAINS purchased the past ten days from our leading PANIC-STRICKEN HOUSES, FOR CASH, the benefit of which purchases ☞ we give to our CUSTOMERS.

We direct attention to our Large Stock of

DRESS AND CLOAK TRIMMINGS, FRINGES, ORNAMENTS, LOOPS, BUTTONS, &c.,

many of our own importation, and immense stock purchased at LAST WEEK'S PANIC SALES.

GREAT BARGAINS! Lace Department.

Samples and Prices sent

The finest and best assortment in the CITY of Real Thread and Guipure Laces,
Real and Italian Valenciennes Laces,
Point and Point Applique Laces.

IN YAK LACES
We are offering Unparalleled Inducements.

Freely upon Application.

Splendid Laces at 22c., 30c., 37c., 43c., 50c., 62c., 73c. 50 per cent. under regular prices.

HAMBURG EMBROIDERIES.—Now opening three entire cases, in all Widths and Qualities, very cheap.

☞ Ladies out of the city can rely upon having their orders promptly attended to. Prices and Goods are always guaranteed.

STERN BROTHERS.

EHRICH & CO.,

287 & 289 8th AVE., Near 24th ST., New York.

Send Stamp for our

36 page FALL CATALOGUE

The most complete Price-List of Millinery, Fancy, and Furnishing Goods ever issued.

Furs our own Manufacture,

&c., &c., &c.

☞ Goods shipped C.O.D., to any part of the country, with full ☞ power of examination before acceptance.

GREAT REDUCTIONS

In BLACK YAK LACES, BLACK YAK, with Jet; SPANISH, with Jet; FRENCH-MADE WORSTED FRINGE, GIMP, Same Shade for Headings.

☞ Orders by Mail promptly filled.

Miller & Grant,

No. 879 Broadway.

FROM AUCTION.

MERINOS, EMPRESS CLOTH, HENRIETTA CLOTH, BLACK SILKS, ALPACAS, BLACK CASHMERES, BOMBAZINES, TAMISE CLOTH, ROYAL SERGE, SHAWLS, &c., &c.

One Case 5-4 PRINCESS CLOTH, 50c., WORTH 80c.

EVERY THING IN PROPORTION.

JACKSON'S,
BROADWAY & WAVERLEY PLACE.

☞ The above materials are offered at a GREAT SACRIFICE on the cost.

UNPARALLELED INDUCEMENTS!!!

More Goods from Auction! Prices Lower than Ever!!

LORD & TAYLOR,

BROADWAY AND TWENTIETH ST.;
GRAND STREET AND CHRYSTIE, New York.

KNABE

Grand, Square, & Upright Pianos,
New York House, No. 112 5th Ave.
WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. Printed Directions accompany each Pattern. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER..... No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK..... " 11
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)..... " 25 CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)..... " 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)..... " 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)..... " 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt).. " 35 LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER..... " 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP..... " 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 48

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old).... " 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER..... " 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)..... " 6
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 20
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER.. " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)..... " 50

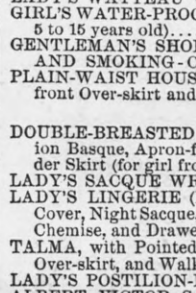
Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)..... " 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT.... " 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT. " 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT..... " 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT..... " 39
DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, with Basque Back and Square Front..... " 43
TIGHT-FITTING DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE, with French Round Skirt..... " 45
SINGLE-BREASTED BASQUINE, with Short Pouf Walking Skirt..... " 47
DOUBLE-BREASTED PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron Front and Square Back Over-skirt and Long Walking Skirt..... " 47
DOLMAN DEMI-TRAINED SUIT..... " 48
WATER-PROOF CLOAK, with Cape and Sleeves..... " 50
TIGHT-FITTING SINGLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE HOUSE DRESS..... " 50

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.



You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N.Y.

L. SHAW,

364 Bowery, cor. 4th St., N.Y.

The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P.O. Order, free of charge.

SCHOOLDAY MAGAZINE.

ONLY $1.00 A YEAR

Eighteenth year. The Cheapest and best Young Folks' Magazine published. A fine $2 Engraving FREE to every subscriber. GOOD PAY to Agents. Send a three-cent stamp for Specimen and "tools" to work with. Address the Publishers,

J. W. DAUGHADAY & CO.,
436 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00: postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.

HERVEY'S CHRISTIAN RHETORIC. A System of Christian Rhetoric, for the Use of Preachers and Other Speakers. By GEORGE WINFRED HERVEY, M.A., Author of "Rhetoric of Conversation," Principles of Courtesy," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

II.

PIKE'S SUB-TROPICAL RAMBLES. Sub-Tropical Rambles in the Land of the Aphanapteryx. By NICOLAS PIKE, U. S. Consul, Port Louis, Mauritius. Profusely Illustrated from the Author's own Sketches; containing also Maps and valuable Meteorological Charts. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

III.

DAWSON'S EARTH AND MAN. The Story of the Earth and Man. By J. W. DAWSON, LL.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University, Montreal. With Twenty Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

IV.

THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

V.

NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1874. With 86 Original Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. Price 25 cents.

VI.

FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

VII.

TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

THE NEW NOVELS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.

HARPER'S LIBRARY EDITION OF WILKIE COLLINS'S NOVELS. Now ready:

THE NEW MAGDALEN.—THE WOMAN IN WHITE.—POOR MISS FINCH. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 each. Other volumes will be issued shortly.

2.

THE TWO WIDOWS. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "Called to Account," "Played Out," "A Passion in Tatters," "The Dower House," "Maud Mohan," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

3.

MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

4.

HARPER'S HOUSEHOLD DICKENS. With Original Characteristic Illustrations by American and British Artists. The following volumes are now ready:

OLIVER TWIST. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.
MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.
DAVID COPPERFIELD. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
DOMBEY AND SON. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
NICHOLAS NICKLEBY. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
BLEAK HOUSE. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
PICKWICK PAPERS. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.
LITTLE DORRIT. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

SAMPLES FREE!!—The Saturday Evening Post, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, gives a beautiful Chromo or large Steel Engraving to every yearly subscriber! Samples free!

LADIES! CONSTITUTION WATER IS GOOD FOR ALL FEMALE COMPLAINTS; gives immediate relief. Dose 40 drops. Send for circular. MORGAN & ALLEN, Agents, 59 John Street.

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS and a book of forty pages mailed for FIFTY CENTS, by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.—Agents are wanted to sell by subscription the book entitled Physiology of the Soul and Instinct, as Distinguished from Materialism. By Martyn Paine, A.M., M.D., LL.D. Liberal inducements offered. For further particulars call on or address AVERY BILL, Care Messrs. Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N.Y.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LININGTON, Chicago.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$375 A MONTH to Male or Female Agents. NOVELTY COMPANY, Biddeford, Me.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

A MATTER-OF-FACT blacksmith, disputing the other day with a friend respecting some point of orthography, was referred by him to Webster's Dictionary.

"Webster!" exclaimed he. "Webster must have been a great fool! Why, he actually spells 'Filip' with Ph, and for 'ruf' he says r-o-u-g-h!"

A little baby is an easy thing to love; but a big baby is a hard thing to love, says a veteran observer—especially if you have married her.

Advertising for a wife is just as absurd as it would be to get measured for an umbrella.

IN PRESS.—On the Cure of Sore Throats. An Essay hitherto omitted from the works of the late Thomas de Quinsey.

What wine does Jack love best?—Why, port, of course.

A BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT—A carpenter's shop.

HOW TO RAISE BEETS.—Take hold of the tops, and pull.

When the spider left the ark, did he walk or take a fly?

Some of the railways lately have signally distinguished themselves.

TOO TRUE.—The man who is awfully urbane to his wife before strangers is generally also "her bane" behind their backs!

SUNDAY STORIES.

AUNT ETHEL. "But when his Brethren next saw Joseph they found him in a Position of great Authority and Power."
ALICE. "Was he a King, Aunt Ethel?" AUNT ETHEL. "No. But he was very high—nearly next to the King."
ALICE (who is fond of cards). "Was he a Knave, then?"

Those who go round with the contribution-box in California churches plead and argue the case as they go along. One of these gentlemen recently extended the box to a rough-looking miner, who slowly shook his head.

"Come, William, give something," said the deacon.

"Can't do it, deak," said Bill.

"Why not? Isn't the cause a good one?"

"Yes, good nuff; but I ain't able to give nothin'."

"Pooh! pooh! I know better. You must give me a better reason than that."

"Well, I owe too much money."

"Well, but, William, you owe God a much larger debt than any one else."

"That's true, but He ain't a-pushin' me like the rest of my creditors."

A WORD TO PROSY LOVERS.—It is not only those women who wear ear-rings whose ears are bored.

A geologist says that he never heard of secondary formations without pleasure—the ladies being the secondary formations, for they were formed after the men.

An Indiana farmer don't pay any tolls. He shoots the gate-keeper, and jogs right along. They have tried him twice, but he gets clear, since one of his aunt's cousins used to act "flighty like."

Why is a selfish friend like the letter P?—Because, though he is the first in pity, he is the last in help.

A THANKSGIVING DINNER SPOILED.

OLD PARTY (waiting for the cars). "There, now, Johnny, I'm afraid I ain't going to enjoy this Thanksgiving much. I declare I've come away and forgot my Teeth!"

ECONOMY IS THE SACRED DUTY OF THE HOUR.

THE WAY MEN CUT DOWN HOUSEHOLD EXPENSES.

A Frenchman professes to have discovered, by experiment upon himself, that coffee taken upon an empty stomach renders the mind abnormally clear and the temper unnaturally bad.

"Wanted, a good general servant, who can neither read nor write, nor be able to do tatting, crochet, or embroidery," is a form of advertisement which appeared the other day in a contemporary.

A hot-tempered citizen of Arkansas, fancying that a revival preacher "meant him" in one of his pointed sermons, sent him a challenge. The minister accepted it, stating that the weapons would be "Bibles and prayer." This nonplused the challenger, and he procured a "court of honor" to "sit" on the matter. The "court," which consisted of six experienced duelists, decided that the clergyman was at fault, "as no gentleman, when challenged, has a right to select weapons to which the challenger is totally unaccustomed!"

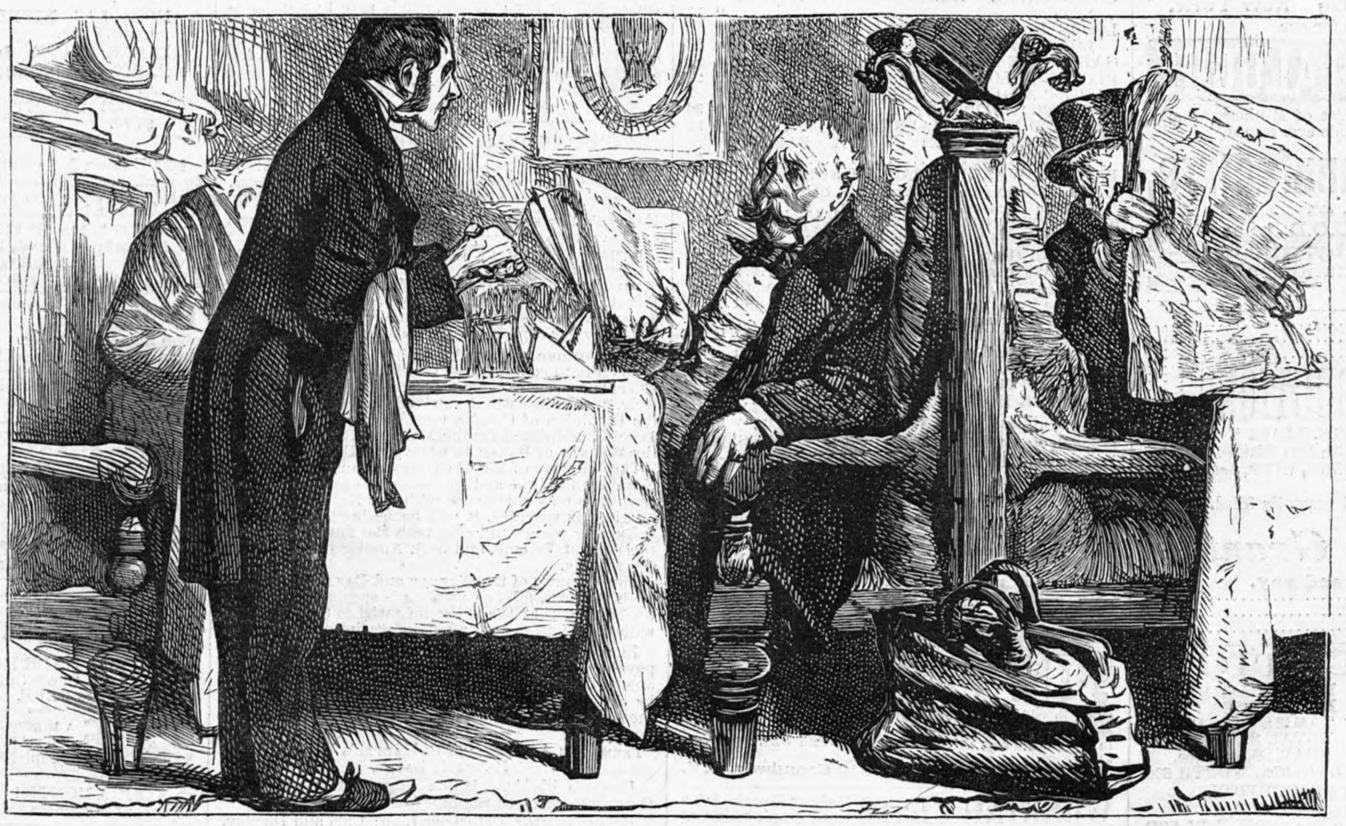
PROFESSOR. "Mr. Hazy, what is light?"

MR. HAZY. "Light, Sir? Light? Did you ask me what light is?"

PROFESSOR. "Yes, Sir."

MR. HAZY. "Light—light—let me see. I declare, Sir, I have forgotten."

PROFESSOR. "Well, what a pity! You are the only man in the world that ever knew."



OLD GENT. "You don't mean to tell me, Waiter, that you can't give me a Toothpick?"
WAITER. "Well, Sir, we used to keep 'em, but the Gents almost invariably took 'em away when they'd done with 'em."

An old farmer said to his sons, "Boys, don't you ever spekerlate, or wait for somethin' to turn up. You might jest as well go and sit down on a stone in the middle of a medder with a pail 'twixt your legs, and wait for a cow to back up to you to be milked."

A writer in the Californian delivers a Sunday-school address, from which the following is an extract: "You boys ought to be kind to your little sisters. I once knew a bad boy who struck his little sister a blow over the eye. Although she didn't fade and die in the early summer-time, when the June roses were blowing, with the sweet words of forgiveness on her pallid lips, she rose up and hit him over the head with a rolling-pin, so that he couldn't go to Sunday-school for more than a month, on account of not being able to put his best hat on."

Chicago wants to have the next world's fair held there. "In the first place," says the Boston Post, "it isn't certain that the next world will have a fair; and in the second place, those who'd be likely to attend it will prefer a more pious town in which to celebrate."

The styles in ladies' dresses have now got back as far as the days of Catherine de Medicis. At this rate we shall soon have reached the styles prevalent in the Garden of Eden.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 50.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADIES' WINTER TOILETTES.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, 839 BROADWAY, N. Y.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Fig. 1.—WATER-PROOF CLOAK, WITH CAPE AND SLEEVES (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). Fig. 2.—TIGHT-FITTING SINGLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE HOUSE DRESS (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN).

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Water-proof Cloak, with Cape and Sleeves; and the Tight-fitting Single-breasted Redingote House Dress, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents each.]

Hosted by Google

Ladies' Winter Toilettes.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

See illustration on first page.

THE two cut paper patterns which we publish this week will be very desirable at the present season. The water-proof cloak, with cape and sleeves, is the most popular style of this useful garment, being a loose sacque, with full sleeves and a separate cape. The tight-fitting single-breasted redingote house dress, which is copied from a Paris model kindly furnished us by Madame Bernheim, will be found very becoming to ladies with figures too full for double-breasted garments. Both suits are clearly explained in the following description and in the New York Fashions article.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN OF WATER-PROOF CLOAK, WITH CAPE AND SLEEVES, AND FRENCH ROUND SKIRT.

THIS suit comprises two articles—water-proof cloak, with cape and sleeves, and French round skirt.

WATER-PROOF CLOAK, WITH CAPE AND SLEEVES.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, back, cape, sleeve, scallop, and pocket. The perforations show where to baste the shoulder and under-arm seams, to take up the darts in the cape, to fit the shoulders, to sew on the pocket, and the size and form of the under part of the sleeve. Cut the back of the body, sleeves, and cape with the longest straight edges laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut the front of the body with the pattern laid lengthwise on the goods. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem in front. Baste the garment, and try it on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. Baste the cape, and try it on over the cloak; if it does not fit well, take up more or less in the shoulder darts. Finish the neck of the cape with a box-pleating of the material cut one inch wide, and bound on both edges with narrow silk braid. The cape can be joined to the sacque by a hook and loop in the middle of the back at the neck, or, if preferred, can be sewed together, and bound with braid. Face the sleeve at the hand, and make a shirr one inch from the edge for an elastic cord to draw the sleeve up to fit the wrist. Face the pocket at the top, and make a shirr one inch from the edge for an elastic, and sew it on the outside of the garment even with the perforations. Close the front all the way down with buttons and button-holes. Rubber buttons are the most serviceable for this purpose. Bind the edge of the scallops with silk or alpaca braid, and turn up for a hem around the bottom of the sacque. A pattern of the scallop is given. If this garment is too long or too short, add to or take from the bottom the amount required, always keeping the same shape. If the sleeve is too long or too short, lengthen or shorten as needed, taking from or adding to the top and bottom an equal amount, so as not to alter the shape. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the shoulder and under-arm seams, and a quarter of an inch for all others.

Quantity of material, 54 inches wide, for medium-sized lady, 5½ yards.

Braid, 8 yards.

Number of buttons, 10.

FRENCH ROUND SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces (only half the pattern is given)—half of front gore, two side gores, and back breadth. The front and side gores are sewed plainly to the belt; the back breadth is laid in three deep side pleats each side of the middle, turning toward the middle of the breadth. Put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8 yards.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN OF TIGHT-FITTING SINGLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE HOUSE DRESS.

THIS suit comprises two articles—tight-fitting single-breasted redingote and long walking skirt.

REDINGOTE.—This pattern is in seven pieces—front, side back, back, sleeve, two cuffs, and collar. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, to take up the darts and cross basque seams, to lay the pleats on the front part of the side form, to place the buttons on the cuff, to loop the skirt in the back, the size and form of the under part of the sleeve, and where to turn down the collar. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others. The front of the garment is fitted with two darts and a cross basque seam on each side, and is closed the entire length from the neck down with buttons and button-holes. The back is adjusted by a centre seam to the waist line and side backs. An extra width is cut on the centre seam at the waist, and laid in five small pleats on the under side. The straight edge of the skirt part of the back is laid on the fold of the goods to avoid a seam, and draped by a tape, cut ten inches long, tacked at the single holes in the middle of the back breadth—one on the end, and the other about five inches above, and at the waist line on the pleats. The skirt is draped high on each side by five side pleats turning downward, according to the ten holes. Begin at the top to lay the pleats, placing the two holes evenly together for every pleat. The sleeves are coat-shaped, and finished at the wrist with a double cuff. The outside edge of the large cuff and the inside edge of the small one are laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Place the cuffs on the sleeve according to the notches. The three buttons set on the small cuff over the single holes hold them in place. Baste up, and try on wrong side out: if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. The notches at the top and bottom on the front show where to turn back for the hem. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back part of the armhole, holding the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. The neck is finished with a small collar, which is sewed on and turned over in the line of perforations. Sew a tape on the under-arm seam on each side, about ten inches below the waist line, and tie in the back underneath the garment. The shoulders are short and coat-shaped. The sleeve is held slightly full over the rounding part when sewing it in. The bottom of the garment is edged by a deep side-pleated ruffle of the material cut four inches wide.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.

Extra for ruffle, 2½ yards.

LONG WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—half of front gore, two side gores, and straight breadth for the back. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edges laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the patterns given for the side gores. Put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 6 was sent out gratuitously an illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, containing further installments of FARJEON'S new CHRISTMAS STORY, and of "THE PARISIANS" and "PHINEAS REDUX."

"GOLDEN GRAIN,"

Another illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 13.

☞ HARPER'S BAZAR for December 27 will contain the opening chapters of a

NEW CHRISTMAS STORY

by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, with magnificent page illustrations. Like every thing that comes from MR. TROLLOPE'S pen, this story will be found brilliant and interesting.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Water-proof Cloak, with Cape and Sleeves; and the Tight-fitting Single-breasted Redingote House Dress, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents each. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 799.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' Vigogne, Diagonal Cloth, and other Winter Suits; Cashmere, Barathea, Silk, and Tulle Hoods; Dress Caps; Gentlemen's Shooting Suits; Game-Bags; Shot-Pouches; Cartridge-Pouches; Powder-Flasks; Dogs' Leashes, etc.; Needle-Cases and Tidies; and an unusually choice collection of Embroidery Patterns in the Louis XIII. style; together with brilliant literary and artistic attractions.

FAMILY QUARRELS.

IT is among some of the contradictions of the human heart that family quarrels are the most bitter of all the quarrels flesh is heir to, as well as the longest-lived. The gulf that has once been made never seems to do more than skim over, and that never sufficiently to bear the weight of an argument. It is true, there are great facilities afforded for family quarrels in the nature of things: one can not hide her weaknesses, her defects, from the scrutiny of the members of her family; they leak out through the tones of the voice, the flash of an eye, through a thousand unsuspected channels. Each becomes so intimate with the other's little tricks of vanity and ostentation, with the other's aspirations and failures, that it amounts to nearly the same thing as a mental and moral photograph, and supplies material from which to draw the provoking retort or the more ungenerous twit. This acquaintance with the traits and temperaments of those composing one's immediate circle is a lesson that is presented to us every day, till we have learned it with as little effort as we learn the shapes and scents of the flowers, but it is a knowledge that we are apt to use in the day of wrath with no fragrant purpose: perhaps it is one of the cases, too, in which a little knowledge is a dangerous thing, since there are fountains of reserve in every nature which no eye but God's is kind enough to fathom.

It may be that one cause of family difficulties lies in the fact that one has no redress from one's own. We may be unjustly dealt with, misunderstood, and "put upon" among our friends, but since it will only aggravate matters to proclaim the truth from the house-tops, there is no alternative but to bear, or to effervesce in a good quarrel, which some people fancy has the virtue of clearing the atmosphere, like a thunder-storm, but which we fear has rather the effect of generating fresh trouble, for the same reason that lightning is apt to strike a second time where it has struck once. And perhaps that which serves to render a family quarrel most bitter and difficult of adjustment is the reflection that it is one's own familiar friend who has taken this advantage, has rewarded devotion with treachery, has searched out one's hidden sin, and dealt scornfully with it: the blow would fail to cut to the quick, to arouse such indignation, if we loved the hand that dealt it less. Perhaps this is the reason of so many conjugal infelicities. Amaryllis can not endure the least shadow of misconception from her Collin; when he hints that her flocks are jumping the fences and trespassing on her neighbors while she looks at her reflection in the brooks, she retorts that the flocks are as much his business as hers; he dodges the conclusion by remarking upon the warmth of her temper, and by this time the ground is well broken for a fair fight and no favor; and when a quarrel is once begun, who can predict where it will end? It begins with such a trifle—a sharp reply, an angry suggestion; it ends oftentimes in separation worse than death.

One of the most embarrassing positions is that of the person who stands in the gap, neutral between the two branches of the family quarrel, and is obliged to listen to both sides in turn, and to furnish apologies for the opposing parties, as a thorough-going peace-maker should. It may be said that only a hypocrite could fill this position; but as a quarrel, like every thing else, has two sides, the person who stands in the gap with single-minded intent might do much to disarm the opponents, since he perceives the amount of wrong in both cases, and is enabled to strike a balance and clear away misconceptions; but it must needs be a brave soul who shall undertake to adjust these family differences. It sometimes strikes the critical listener a little oddly to hear those who are breast-deep in family disagreements of their own gravely remark on the wickedness of those in which their neighbors are involved, and wonder how Mrs. Sharp can browbeat her mother-in-law, or how Miss Muffet can reconcile the contemptuous treatment of her sister with her professions of religion, when it might be supposed that they were the very persons best qualified to understand such methods: the Pharisee's sins seem so insignificant in his eyes compared with the sins of another. Perhaps one of the most fruitful sources of family jars is to be found in money; and yet it seems strange enough that affection, which is a natural attribute of the soul, should yield to the outward accident of filthy lucre; but financial dealings among relatives so often result in alienation and distrust that it has almost grown into a proverb. One would naturally suppose that among those possessed by the true family feeling of unity the interests would be so nearly identical that nothing of a material nature could effect a separation; but when we see people at loggerheads with their own flesh and blood, because that flesh and blood makes claims which it is not compatible with selfish ease to fulfill—when we see brothers and sisters at sword's point, figuratively speaking, bandying taunts, treading on each other's toes, and keeping a sort of preserve at hand of all the subjects upon which they disagree most violently, and among which they are constantly coming to grief, like flies in a drop of molasses—does it appear as though they were gratefully regarding the blessings of One who setteth the solitary in families?

WEATHER PROBABILITIES.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

WHOEVER looked at the New England daily newspaper for November 17, 1873, could have seen in its quiet little corner the quiet little announcement that New England and the Middle States might expect "high northeasterly winds, threatening weather, rain, and snow." General MYER, sitting in your snug retreat at Washington, and weaving a web of storm for this great country, when you penned that simple phrase did you know what you were saying?

First a tempestuous Sunday, but that we can put up with. It is so restful, so Sabbath-like to have a long, luxurious day before you, with no work to do, with no care to occupy your mind, only pleasant books to read and pleasant thoughts to think, sitting by the open wood fire, and watching the flames curl up the gnarled forks of the old apple branches. I believe apple-tree wood is the best wood, after all. It smells of pond-lilies, and brings the fragrance of blossoming orchards into that worst of midwinter, the late fall. Then it has a rare ruddy look, and you fancy yourself sitting by an odorous holocaust of precious wood—sandal-wood, the red cedar-tree by which TENNYSON'S red Indian danced. And withal it makes a hot fire; and if you do not have it properly cut, but left crooked and long and ramifying as it grew, it is a pretty piece of architecture as it lies, a solid frame-work overswept by lithe yellow flames. And the lovely day lapses into night-fall, and you bethink yourself of the chicken, and resolve to fry him. You are well rested for the experiment, and nobody will be in to share, or create chagrin if the experiment fails. But it does not fail, only turns out somehow to be a fricassee rather than a fry, but toothsome to the last degree. And then shuts down night and storm and darkness wondrous strong. But the next morning all the world is white. We have to be shoveled out. Winter has come in good earnest, and overtaken us belated farmers. We behold our delayed wood-piles with dismay. No, Winter has changed his mind. Snow gives way to sleet, and sleet changes to rain, and then come up "high northeasterly winds and threatening weather" in good earnest. Threatening, indeed! It threatens, and it makes good its threat. First the wind snaps up so suddenly that it steals a march on us, and the big furnace fire goes out—just puffs to death in a half hour—and the first we know a cold draught is whistling up the register. But the little furnace is left, and we snuggle in the dining-room till bed-time.

"Ah," says Malone, "the attic window is up for me clo'es!" Then, with lamp in hand, we mount to the ghostly garret, more ghostly for the lines of ghostly garments that hang criss-crossing it from Monday's wash, to dry at their leisure, and the east blind is slamming furiously, and shadows lurk under the eaves, and Malone fastens the blind with various strings, and is thoroughly drenched as to her buxom arms and sturdy chest, and we grope around the sombre chimneys and glide solemnly down stairs, and seek sweet sleep.

Sleep, is it? The rain thunders down on the tin roof of the piazza like the tramp of the Grand Army. The wind shrieks down the water-spouts like an angry fiend—the wraith of wrath and despair. The soot rattles down the chimney in a determined, industrious way, as if it meant to be of as much account as the rest of the uproar. But then it is certainly soot rattling down on the paper ready for kindling, and not mice; and despite of spout and wraith and rain and rattle, sleep steals over the tired eyes, till a big gust gives a big shake, and you know the cleat has come out of the dressing-room window, and, as the Shaker song says, it will

> "Shake, shake out of you
> All that is car-nal!"

And all that is spiritual too; so you rise and fumble, and find the cleat, and jam it in, and lie down again.

And the anger of the wind rises, and it whacks against the house with a violence that makes every beam tremble and the beds rock; and bang goes a blind, and bang goes another, and bang go the whole lot. I am sure there were thirty blinds cavorting over this house on the night of the 17th November, and each envious to surpass all the others in the force with which it whacked against the house. If there were only one, it might be worth while to hunt it up, but who can fasten a myriad at midnight? Besides, they are probably the double-window blinds, and inaccessible from within. Let them whack. But it is intolerable. There is no sleep and no peace. Let us fasten the nearest ones. Not a match will light. Match-box, table, carpet, are phosphorescent with glowing lines, but not a match will light. I wish the man who sold them to me had to eat them in his soup. But success at length crowns persistency, and the cheerful candle shows a floor strewn with matches not made in heaven, evidently; but the blinds have stopped their cannonade. Every window seems to be thoroughly secured—perhaps the wind itself has fastened them: such things are not unknown—and you blow out your candle, and lie down with gladness and singleness of heart; and no sooner has your head touched the pillow than those imps return to the charge with new vigor—thump! thump! thump! You attack the matches with an energy that breaks half of them at the first touch, and find and fasten one belligerent blind at the cost of a great wetting; but another is on a double window, and can not be touched, and of another the window is swollen and can not be opened; and so they wreak their passion through the night. Sometimes the storm sobs into a lull, and you drop quickly into unconsciousness, and then it starts up with sudden fury, and every blind and beam and water-spout rages in sympathy, and you are broad awake again: and oh! that a carpenter were lashed to every blind!

Hosted by Google

And in the morning the fences are down, and the paper around the east windows is a pulp, and the deluge has dripped on the window-seats and spattered up the window-shades, and the down-stairs bedroom is all afloat; and as you go in to look at it, in response to Malone's horrified cries—splash! you step into a mill-pond in the closet entry—and all General MYER has to say about it is:

"Probabilities.—For the Middle and Eastern States high northeasterly winds and threatening weather!"

Ah, General MYER, General MYER, bold soldier-boy, if this was what you meant, why did you not say so?

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE SINGLE-BREASTED TIGHT-FITTING REDINGOTE SUIT.

ONE of the most useful and fashionable costumes of the winter is the long tight-fitting single-breasted redingote suit, illustrated on our first page, and of which a cut paper pattern is published. This redingote commends itself by its simple shape and graceful style, and is now the popular over dress for woolen suits of cloth, cashmere, vigogne, serge, and de bège, and is also used for expensive camel's-hair redingotes that are worn over velvet or silk skirts. Costumes made by this model are considered appropriate both for house and street. The model from which our illustration is taken is of ladies' cloth of the deepest indigo blue, trimmed with dark silver buttons. To be stylish, the front of the redingote must fit without a wrinkle, and must be long enough to come within three or four inches of the foot of the dress; these fronts are also made very broad, in order to drape very high and far back on the sides. The back of the waist is cut in English fashion, in four pieces, that are all of similar breadth at the waist, and the two buttons used to define the waist are placed on the side forms as far apart as on gentlemen's coats. The fullness added in the skirt is held in pleats laid under the middle seam, and in double-width goods the back is cut in a way that prevents a seam coming in the middle of the skirt, showing only the pressed lines of the fold. The drapery is done by tapes and buttons, and it is very necessary that the skirt be tied back over the tournure; indeed, in many instances there are two sets of tapes for holding back the redingote skirt. The short shoulders now in vogue are seen to perfection in this garment. For ladies of medium size the shoulder just in front of the arm is little more than an eighth of a yard deep; this shortness, however, must be where the armhole is hollowed out, and not directly in the shoulder seam, which now extends further back than it has done of late. The top of the close coat sleeve is then deeply rounded, projecting above the point of the shoulder, and in some French garments it is made to stand erect, precisely as is seen in gentlemen's clothing. The neck may be finished by a bias band, or an English collar—straight behind, with points turned over in front—or else the more flaring Medicis collar of the cloth with silk lining.

The trimming on the redingote illustrated is a narrow side pleating of the cloth, with saw-teeth notches on each edge. This is stylish, but so heavy that many ladies prefer a bias facing of velvet or silk two inches wide on the wrong side, showing merely a piping fold on the right. Those who are tired of these plain-edged garments put woolen ball fringe on wool redingotes: yak lace is not so popular as formerly. For black cashmere redingotes the favorite trimming is a band of jet galloon, with silk fringe in which jet is intermingled; but if this is too expensive, use a bias band of cashmere two and a half inches wide, with a silk piping on the upper edge. For camel's-hair and velvet redingotes a fur band, either of fox, fisher, chinchilla, or black marten, is considered most elegant, and there are various styles of India embroidery for this purpose, either of wool or silk, monotone and shaded, or else in various colors, like the borders of India shawls. There are no pockets in our model, and there begins to be a protest against large pockets, large buttons, and large ruffs; but those who choose add large square pockets with deep flaps, set very far back on the sides or else on the back of the redingote. The sleeve has a double cuff, stiffly lined, piped on the edges, and ornamented with three buttons and mock button-holes of silk cord or piping. The belt may be worn or omitted at pleasure. The skirt may be a demi-train for the house, shortened by rings and tapes for the street, and should be tied behind the person by tapes attached to the second side seams; it may be entirely without trimming, or have two bias folds piped on each edge, or else one or two narrow rows of side pleating like that on the redingote.

THE WATER-PROOF SACQUE CLOAK.

There are two items of dress for which ladies of experience prefer to send to London rather than Paris, viz., deep mourning dresses and water-proof cloaks. English water-proof cloth is certainly far better than any made in this country, although the fabric is of American origin, and the superiority of the London cloak is due to the fact that it is a necessity in that land of fog and rain; and it has been experimented upon until perfection of shape has been obtained. We gave in a former volume a pattern of a Raglan water-proof sacque, with a half cape forming the sleeves, and now add a cut paper pattern of the sacque water-proof with sleeves, cape, and pockets, from an English model. The long ample sacque with merely two seams, one under each arm, should reach nearly to the edge of the dress skirt, which is necessarily short for walking in wet weather. This lower edge is usually hemmed and plain, but the edge of the talma cape is prettiest when scalloped and neatly bound with braid. It is bad taste to wear a belt with this cloak. The easy-fitting sleeves have an elastic band above the edge, loose enough for the hand to pass through, yet tight enough to gather the sleeve into a ruffle on the wrist. The pockets are described elsewhere. Hoods are so little used with the large bonnets and hats now worn that they are omitted from most cloaks, as they give a full round-shouldered appearance when hanging down the back. An English collar of the water-proof, or else a pleated ruche like that described elsewhere, is placed around the neck. Sometimes rows of yak braid trim the capes of these cloaks, but this adds nothing to their beauty, and makes the garment heavier. Gutta-percha or else polished black wood buttons fasten the entire front. Navy blue with purple tinges is the favorite color for water-proof cloaks. Blue English water-proof cloth costs from $3 25 to $5 a yard in cloth width; black English water-proof is from $2 25 to $3; American water-proof cloth in blue and purple shades is worth from $1 25 to $2 50 a yard; black water-proof of domestic manufacture costs from $1 to $2. Colored American water-proof is apt to rub off and soil the clothing worn with it; this is seldom true of the English fabric, and the latter is also to be commended as much lighter and better wearing.

ECONOMIC FASHIONS.

How to make "auld claes look amaist as weel's the new" was never so desirable as in this season of panic, nor happily was it ever so easy. Simple styles, as we constantly reiterate, are the highest fashion, and most of the elaborate costumes of the past few years can be modernized by merely taking off parts of their garniture, while those that are worn or soiled can be cleaned and used for the foundation of another suit—with a new polonaise, and perhaps a border on the skirt. The black silks of last year can be cleansed, and their lustre and dressing renewed, by sponging them on the wrong side with ale greatly diluted with water; no given rule will answer with various qualities of silk, but it is well to mix equal quantities of each, and experiment on a sample of the silk, adding more water if the silk is too stiff when dry. Black alpacas may also be restored almost to their first beauty by using a thimbleful of borax dissolved in a pint of warm water, and put on with a nail-brush. If the dress skirt is much worn and soiled around the bottom, add a fresh facing, cut off the soiled parts of the dress material, and piece it out to the edge of the facing with one of the now superfluous flounces—perhaps the upper part of the lower flounce, which is also worn on the edge—and cover the joining with a newer and simpler trimming made of the upper flounces. The reaction in favor of plainly trimmed skirts is making itself evident daily. We do not mean that dress skirts are most usually made entirely plain, but, as an excellent French authority says, bordered skirts, not flounced ones, are the fashion. Instead of being covered with trimmings of one kind in front, another sort on the sides, and a third behind, there is now straight around the skirt a border, perhaps of flounces, or it may be of folds, but quite narrow, and giving a most artistic finish to the costume. For this border on silk dresses use a single flounce fully gathered and edged with a narrow pleated ruffle, and a similar pleating for heading, or else have two pleatings four or five inches wide, overlapping, and headed by a cluster of very small folds. A single pleating is also considered sufficient border for cloth and heavy wool dresses. All this conduces greatly to economy, as three or four yards of silk now serve for trimming, instead of the ten or twelve formerly required.

To remodel last year's polonaises, make them tight-fitting in the body, and draw their skirt drapery further backward, taking the pleats back of the side seam instead of on it; make the sleeves close, with a revers cuff and a silk pleating falling over the hand; put the pockets further back or else omit them, and add a standing flaring collar instead of a ruff; this collar, cuffs, and pockets can be made of new silk darker than the polonaise, and will give it an air of freshness. A belt may be added, fastened behind by a silver buckle, or else a ribbon sash, doubled, with one flat loop hanging over the belt, and two long ends.

The loose velvet sacques of past winters are being cut down to make shapely English walking jackets. If the pattern is short, it may be made almost tight-fitting, and its style enhanced thereby. The trimming should be a silk facing and silk-covered buttons, or else jet galloon (not passementerie), with buttons made of tiny jet beads instead of the large ones cut in facets; or, better still, a narrow band of long dark fur should border the jacket. Cloth sacques are altered in the same way, and trimmed with bias silk or velvet, showing below the edge like a mere cord. Sleeveless velvet jackets are in greater favor than at any time since their introduction. They require very little material, and when made of black velvet may be worn with various dresses, and, with silk sleeves, will serve as a new waist for black silk dresses of a former season. A silk cord on the edge is the only necessary trimming.

Last winter's bonnets are also easily remodeled, because, though new frames are slightly larger, the material is put so plainly on the frame that very little is required, three-fourths of a yard of narrow bonnet velvet being all milliners require. If the pile of the velvet has been flattened in the folds, it can be raised by steaming over a hot iron, on which a moist cloth is laid; if this will not restore it, the creases must be concealed by bands, loops, and twists of turquoise or twilled silk. A soft puff of silk under the brim, some erect loops on one side, a steel dagger on the other, and two short curled plumes will give style to last year's Rabagas hats. To add a suggestion of the new Directoire bonnets, a branch of roses or half a wreath is placed on the left side of the brim and extended to the front; this is newer than the low-drooping rose behind.

CHEAP GOODS.

The large reduction of prices advertised by merchants has been met with doubt by many, but it is bona fide, and is compelled by the scarcity of money. Experienced shoppers and lovers of bargains are soon convinced of this when shown excellent calicoes for nine or ten cents a yard, and Wamsutta muslin at fifteen cents, while other standard brands are at similar low prices. A list of the reductions in woolen goods was given last week, and might be extended now with a greater variety of fabrics at the popular price of 50 cents a yard. The good result of simple styles is also now evident, when twelve or fourteen yards of double-width woolen goods will make a polonaise and skirt instead of the eighteen or twenty yards formerly used. Among other seasonable bargains are felt Balmoral skirts, beginning as low as $1 50 for plain gray untrimmed skirts. The prettiest Balmorals of the season are of deep blue or else crimson serge, cut very narrow, and trimmed with three or four narrow box-pleated ruffles, scarcely more than ruches, bound each side with braid, and set on quite far apart. Woven merino petticoats, heavy and warm, though not very fine, are sold for $1 75 or $2.

For information received thanks are due Madame BERNHEIM; and Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and A. T. STEWART & Co.

PERSONAL.

THE Rev. Dr. PARKER appears to be in a state of gush when speaking in public in London of his experiences in the United States. He thinks the Americans the most tremendous people on the planet, with a tremendous future before them. Nothing struck that doctor more than the unbounded and "inexpressible" hospitality and generosity of the American people. "We careful English people," said he, "ask the price of things, talk about making both ends meet, and cut our coat according to our cloth," which he thinks we "do not do," wherein he makes much mistake. He is more accurate when he says that "Christian ministers of good ability are in not a few cases paid as handsomely as great officers of state are paid in England." Finally, we appreciate the doctor's sunny and hopeful temper when he says, "I can not but hope and believe that in less than seven years I shall preach in Westminster Abbey or in St. Paul's Cathedral."

—Men who have charge of roads must be careful to fill up holes. Mrs. SALLY GILSON, of Stoneham, who fell into one of those objectionable places and hurt herself grievously, sued the town for damages, and a few days ago beat that town of Stoneham, and won a verdict of $4500, which amount she has received in grand cash.

—COLERIDGE, when a lecturer, in his younger days, was once violently hissed by some excited individual who did not love what COLERIDGE was saying, whereupon the poet delivered the following smart retort: "When a cold stream of truth is poured on red-hot prejudices, no wonder that they hiss."

—Within the last thirty months there have died in Blackstone, Massachusetts, six persons whose united ages amount to 524 years, viz.: ANNIE TOURTELLOTTE, 93; EMOR TOURTELLOTTE, 93; ZEBEDEE YOUNG, 93; THURBOR WARFIELD, 90½; LAWTON WALDEN, 78 years, 2 months, 3 days; and STEPHEN TUCKER, 76 years, 2 months, 3 days. People go to Blackstone with a view to longevity.

—A remarkable Scotchwoman, Mrs. JANET HAMILTON, known as the Coatbridge poetess, has recently died. She was the daughter of a shoe-maker, and although without education, the mother of a large family—she married at thirteen—and for many years toward the close of her life totally blind, yet contrived, says the Pall Mall Gazette, amidst circumstances seemingly so adverse from first to last, not only to store her mind by self-culture, but to produce poems and various other writings of no ordinary merit. She was in her seventy-eighth year.

—Mr. BERESFORD HOPE, supposed to be the wealthiest commoner of England, has presented 26,000 entomological specimens to the Oxford Museum.

—BURNS is to be honored by a colossal statue in Glasgow. G. W. EWING, a British sculptor, is to do the stone-cutting.

—Two Jewish ladies recently passed a government examination in Rome, which enabled them to become teachers in a communal school. The fact is noteworthy in so far that this instance is the first of that kind that has ever occurred in Rome.

—Professor BROWN, of Baltimore, in explaining to a class of young ladies the theory according to which the body is entirely renewed every seven years, said, "Thus, Miss B——, in seven years you will in reality be no longer Miss B——." The young lady modestly dropped her eyes, and with tone demure responded, "I really hope I sha'n't."

—Immediately after the declaration of war in 1870 the King of Prussia ordered Councilor SCHNEIDER to superintend the making of a collection of publications of all sorts and all countries relating to the war. The collection is now exhibited to the public in the central hall of the Royal Library at Berlin, and excites great interest.

—The Rev. Dr. OSGOOD, who has recently been revisiting some of our New England colleges, doubtless had a pleasant time at New Haven, where it was, he says, "pleasant to meet names and persons of historical interest, such as the HILLHOUSES, INGERSOLLS, GERRYS, EDWARDSES, and many others. In ELBRIDGE GERRY'S venerable daughters, who came with their mother from Boston to live in New Haven in 1833, I felt that the spirit of the old historical age stood before me, and their house is full of suggestive memorials. The new age has its conspicuous representatives, not only in the scholars and sages of the university, but in the stirring spirits of business, art, and letters. I met again with pleasure Mr. DONALD G. MITCHELL, in his charming villa near the city, and found him far in advance of the Reveries of a Bachelor amidst the delights of his blooming family and patriarchal acres. In rural taste and enterprise, as in literature, he continues his good work, and New Haven owes him more than most of her people are aware."

—Let not the American lady, reduced in circumstances, who follows the not positively popular, but useful and sometimes remunerative, avocation of boarding-house keeper, think she is at a discount in the social scale, for in the very last number of the London Court Journal we find an advertisement which may be suggestive to her head, and impart courage to her heart:

"TO AMERICANS AND OTHERS.—A nobleman and his wife, keeping a most comfortable establishment near town, would receive two American or English ladies or gentlemen to introduce into the best society. High references asked. Terms according to requirements. Private sitting-room, carriages, etc. Address Lady ——."

—The British government has appointed Miss POGSON, the eldest daughter of the government astronomer of Madras, to be assistant astronomer at the government observatory. The young lady will very shortly arrive at Madras to enter upon her duties.

—The Vienna Presse states that the Exhibition was visited by two emperors, one empress, three kings, five queens, five reigning grand dukes, three grand duchesses, thirteen heirs to a throne, five crown princesses, twenty princes and dukes, and fourteen princesses. The potentates who did not go to Vienna were the Queen of England, the Sultan, the Kings of Greece, Portugal, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Bavaria, and Saxony, and the Grand Duke of Hesse. Only three European courts were altogether unrepresented at Vienna, namely, the Turkish, the Portuguese, and the Hessian. The Shah of Persia is not included in the above list of visitors.

—Concerning birthdays there is an old prophetic rhyme, which exists in as many languages as versions, as to the results of being born on a certain day in the week. One runs as follows:

"Monday's child is fair of face;
Tuesday's child is full of grace;
Wednesday's child has toil and woe;
Thursday's child has far to go;
Friday's child is loving and giving;
Saturday's child works hard for his living;
And the child that is born on the Sabbath-day
Is happy and lucky and wise and gay."

Here are a few tests. BYRON was born on a Tuesday; so was NAPOLEON I.; NAPOLEON II. (M. ROCHEFORT'S ideal emperor) on a Wednesday; NAPOLEON III. also on a Wednesday; Pope PIUS IX. on a Sunday; GARIBALDI on a Wednesday; BISMARCK on a Friday (the 1st of April!); the unhappy Emperor MAXIMILIAN also on a Friday, his empress on a Sunday; Mr. GLADSTONE on a Friday, and Mr. DISRAELI on a Saturday.

—The Rev. NEWMAN HALL seems to have made himself quite acceptable to the Chicago people, who flocked to hear him. He told them that his church in London was Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, Quaker, Episcopalian, etc., for it used in some form many of the forms and ceremonies of all these churches—which makes it a little difficult to say where the Rev. N. H. stands himself. He has under his charge seventeen Sunday-schools and 450 teachers, and keeps up the work with great vigor. Saw him in Broadway a few days ago. Pepper-and-salt dress.

—A gentleman recently in Paris, who had the pleasure of assisting at a levée of Madame THIERS, says that with the ex-President it is a matter of health to have an audience. "He must talk; must use his organs; must sharpen his wits by contact with the world; but he will no longer have the noble audience he had in the Place St. George, where he was petted by the old nobility because he made opposition to the empire, and by literary men because he wrote the Consulate and Empire. The salon of Madame THIERS has become the caucus of the Left, and their political meetings are held there every evening. Lord HOWDEN must rest uneasy in his grave if conscious of the crowd which now swells the salons of the Hôtel Bagration. And for the visitors he has there is one great inconvenience—M. THIERS sleeps every day from five to seven o'clock, rarely dines before eight, and hence tea is only served about ten. Between eleven and twelve the little man is in his glory, standing before his chimney, with both hands under his coat tails, and laying down the law upon every conceivable subject in a way which would have been very creditable to MOSES. In point of fact, MOSES was an ignoramus compared with M. THIERS, and the only wonder is, as GOLDSMITH expressed it, 'how one small head could carry all he knew.' I give the idea here, and leave the reader to put the tenses in accord. But there are some interesting persons who frequent Madame THIERS'S salon. There is the Princess TROUBETSKOI, the Comtesse APPIONY, Madame ROGER DU NORD, Mesdames SIMON, ADAM, ROTHUAN, and others who formed the republican court during the THIERS régime."

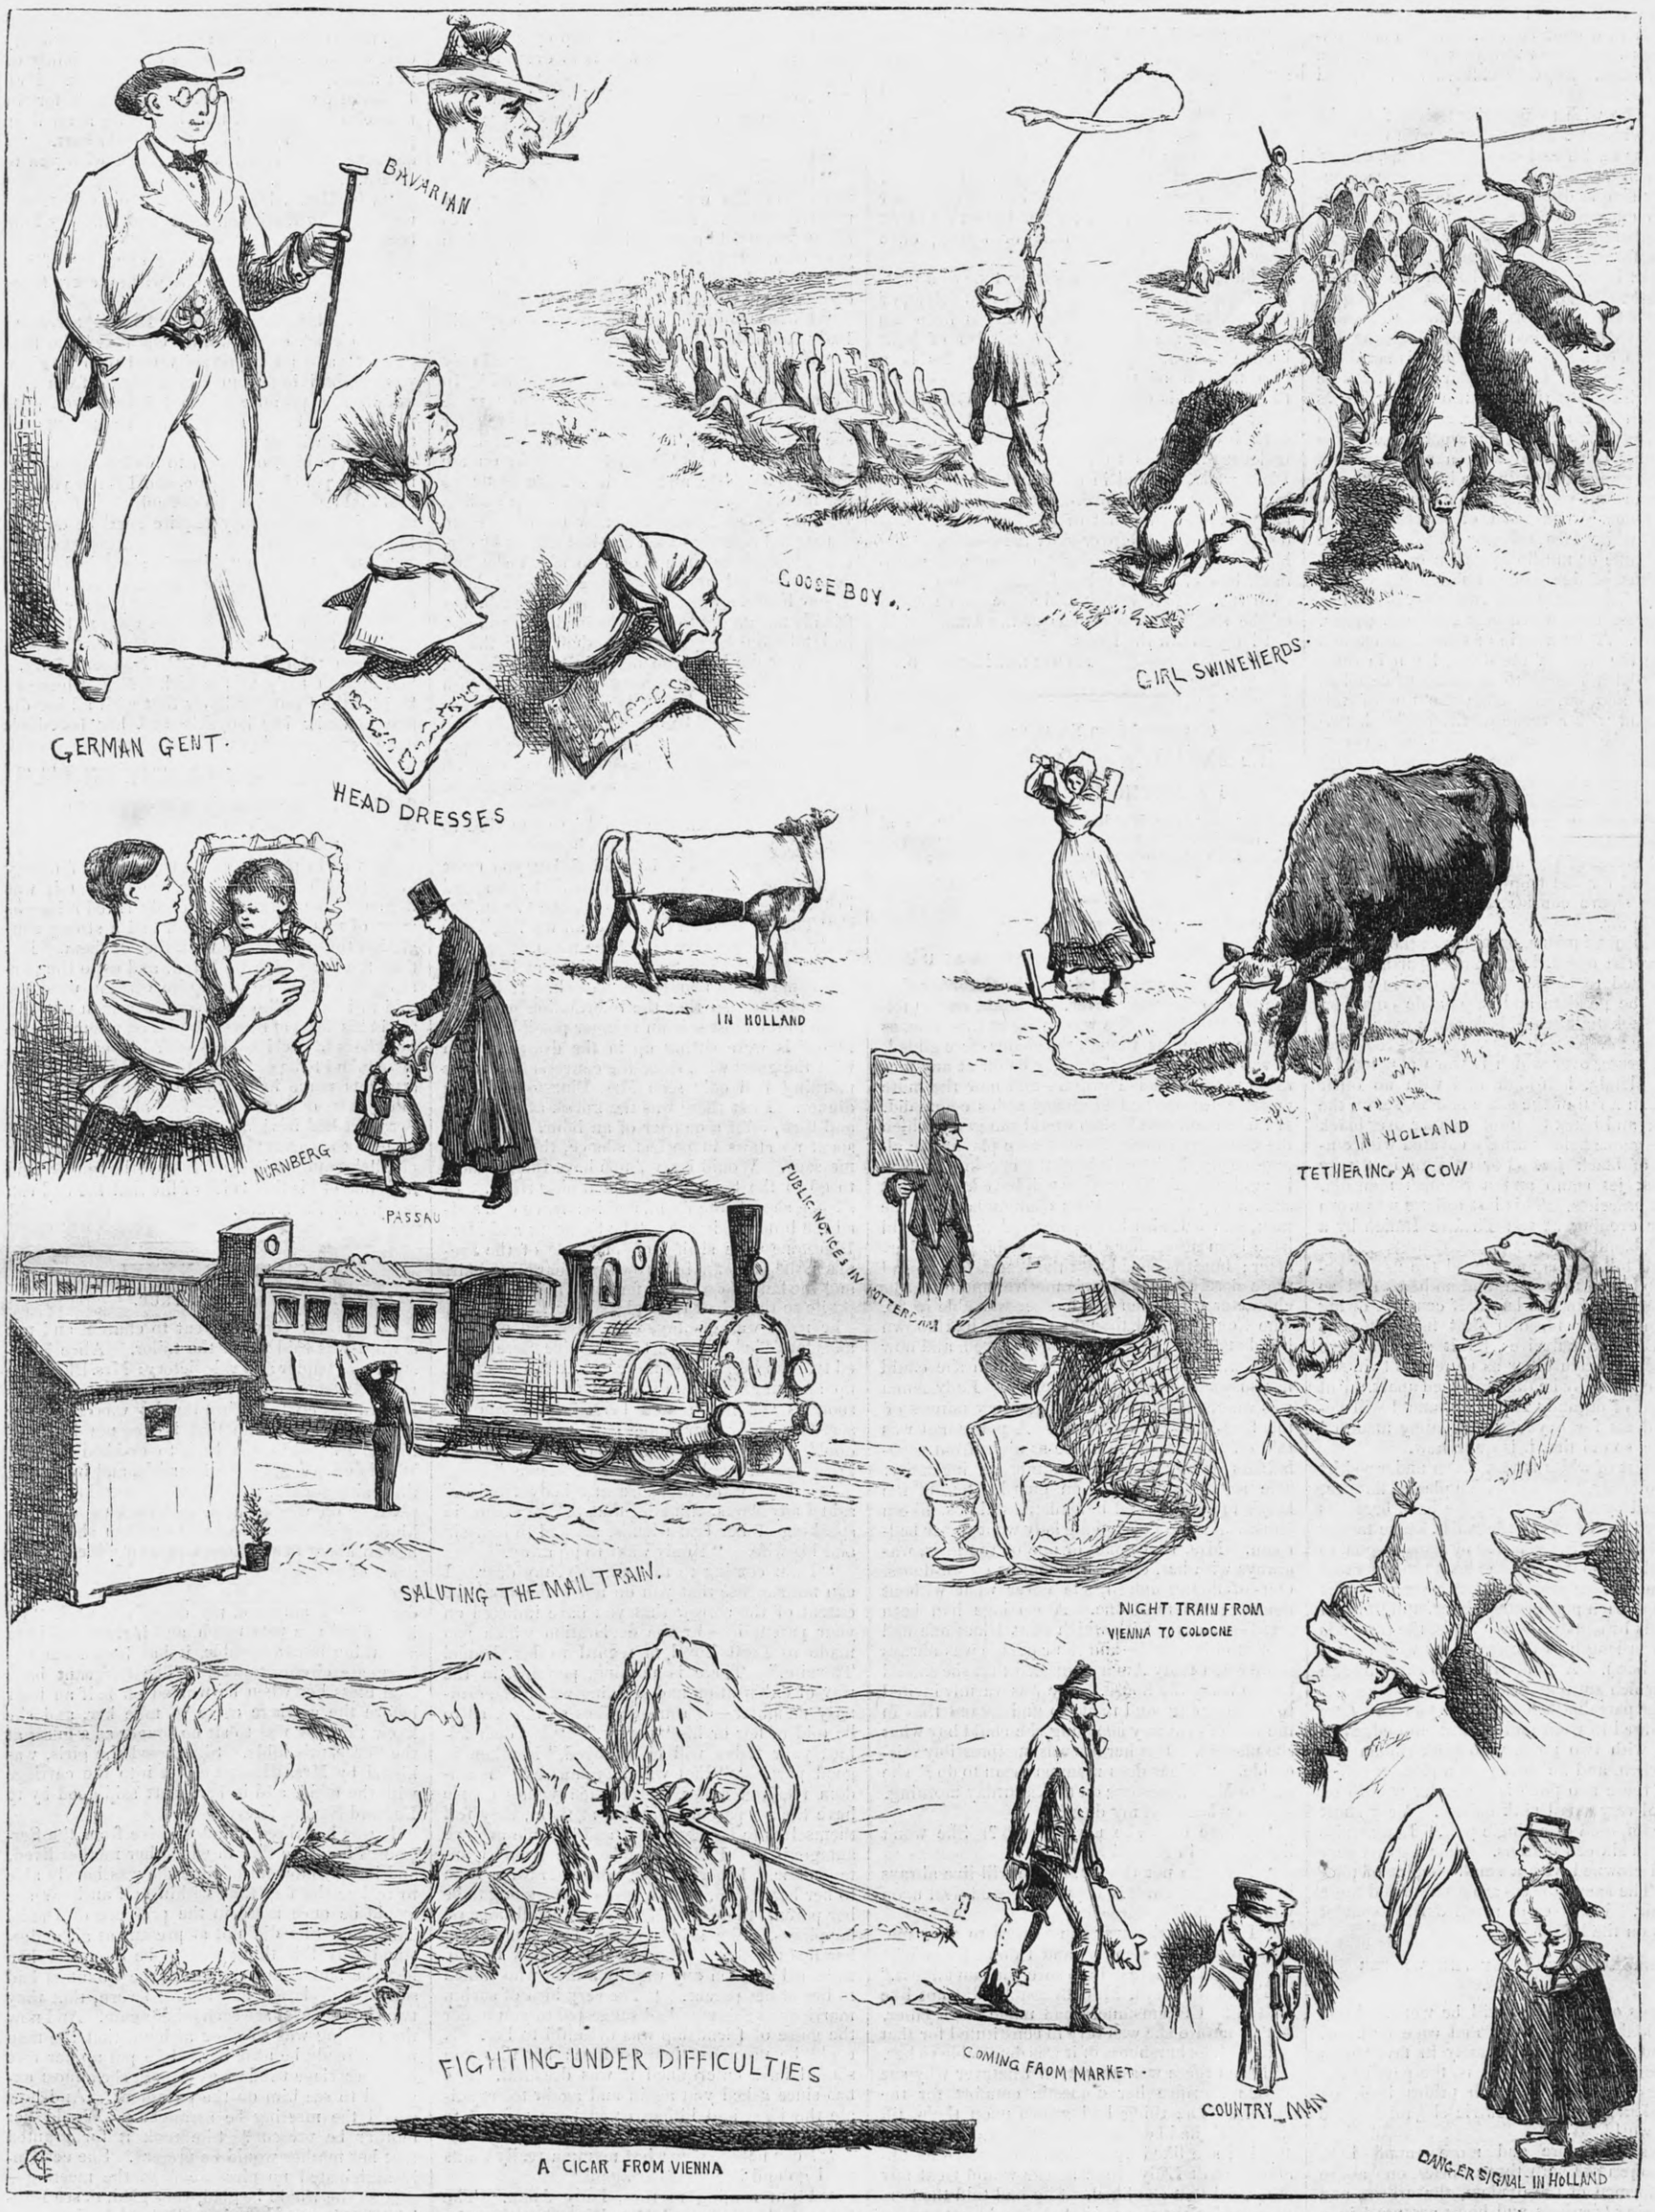
—Dean HOWSON, in a recent English publication, tells how the missionary hymn, "From Greenland's icy mountains," came to be written: "When Bishop HEBER was a young man missionary sermons were not so frequent as they are now, and on one occasion, when he was staying with Dean SHIRLEY, vicar of Wrexham, his father-in-law, such a sermon was to be preached, and the want of a suitable hymn was felt. He was asked on the Saturday to write one; and seated at the window of the old vicarage house, he produced, after a short interval, in his clear handwriting, with one single word corrected, that hymn beginning, 'From Greenland's icy mountains,' with which we are all familiar. It was printed that evening, and sung the following day in Wrexham church." The original manuscript of the hymn is now in the possession of Mr. EDWARD RAFFLES, the magistrate, of Liverpool.

—Bridgeport, Connecticut, witnessed a few days since a pleasant and quite unusual incident—the celebration of the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. HENRY CURTIS, on which occasion all their children and grandchildren were present. No death had occurred in the family in half a century.

Hosted by Google

PREPARING FOR WINTER.

Hosted by Google



AN ARTIST'S NOTES ON THE CONTINENT—JOTTINGS IN A RAILWAY CARRIAGE FROM VIENNA TO ROTTERDAM.

AN ARTIST'S NOTES ON THE CONTINENT.

ON his return to England from Vienna via Rotterdam the artist has jotted down a few reminiscences of the features of the country on the route as seen from the window of a railway carriage. The titles of many of the subjects afford an explanation in themselves. "Thus a 'Swineherdess' needs little comment," he writes, "save that it is rather foreign to our ideas that girls should be so employed. These girls are hardly cleaner than the pigs. The 'Goose Boy' is a sketch near Würzburg. His whip is a switch with string lash, and at the end of the string a bit of red rag, with which he keeps his flock in order. The 'Bavarian of the Hawker Tribe' is a man who tramps the country with a large box filled with gloves, etc., which he sells to hotel servant-maids, etc. 'The German Gent' is simply a sketch of a fellow-passenger at Passau station. 'Kissing the Priest's Hand.' It is a noteworthy sight to see the children come up, and, with a courtesy, kiss the priest's hands. I never knew it before, but it is the custom for every good Catholic to take off his hat at the strike of twelve mid-day, the time for prayer. The 'Public Notice Board' is carried about Rotterdam by a youth. 'Saluting the Mail in Holland.' Directly the engine comes up to the man, standing attention, he salutes and remains in that position until the last carriage has passed him. 'Danger signal' in point of color made a very pretty sketch. 'Coming from Market' would not fail to attract the attention of any one who is not stone-deaf, as the cries of the two sucking pigs can be heard all over the place. 'Fighting under Difficulties' was also a 'sketch under difficulties,' as the swinging motion of the express train quite prevented me from taking a more decided sketch, I being totally unable to make a straight line. One animal is fastened by a pole fixed by a rope round its horns, and secured at the other end to a strong stake planted in the ground, the other ditto, only that the pole is fixed to its pastern. The 'Cigar from Vienna,' like a preceding sketch, the 'Head-dresses,' is characteristic of that town; it is about double the length and size of the one shown in the sketch, with a straw nearly an inch long forming the mouth-piece."

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THERE being no important change in the fashion of garments, the lovers of novelty indemnify themselves by the diversity of fabrics that are found in the markets. Velvet is the favorite material of the season, hence it is manufactured in a thousand different styles. There is pékin velvet, with alternate satin or silk and velvet stripes; brocaded velvet, with bright-colored velvet raised flowers on a silk ground; stamped velvet, with a ground of faille spread with large damask velvet figures; and velveteens, in which innumerable streaks of lightning seem to traverse the velvet ground of a darker shade. All these are made into suits, with polonaises worn over a skirt of the same material, but plain; or else into plain dresses, very long and looped in a pouf behind. Long black velvet dresses are almost always trimmed with a tablier of black lace, embroidered with jet, and tied behind.

Hosted by Google

Those who wish to free themselves from the polonaise without breaking openly with the present fashions devise various combinations, one of which I will describe as a type. Suppose a comparatively simple dress of very dark écru Sicilienne—an extremely silky poplin. The skirt is very long behind, so as to be draped in a pouf, while the front clears the ground. The tablier of the skirt is trimmed with lengthwise rows of black velvet ribbon, separated by a space equal to their width. The skirt is trimmed all around the bottom with a bias fold of Sicilienne, six inches wide, on which velvet ribbon is set diagonally; above this is a similar fold, likewise trimmed with velvet ribbon, but only four inches wide, which edges the tablier, and extends to the waist, perfectly simulating a polonaise. The basque-waist is trimmed with a still narrower fold of the same kind, only two inches wide.

Sleeves are all very large, so as to give room for under-sleeves composed of several pleated ruffles of white lace, tulle, or muslin. Large ruches of tulle or muslin are worn on the neck. Small fichus, of light-colored faille or crêpe de Chine, which are easily made, and very becoming, are also much used, worn over half-open waists, for evening. Take a strip of faille long enough to border the neck of the dress, lay it in three lengthwise pleats so as to simulate three folds, one above another, and edge the top of this pleated band with a ruche of the material, raveled out on the top so as to form a light, vaporous fringe; then under this ruche set a thick ruche of white illusion, which comes above it, and takes the place of lingerie.

Close sleeves are modernized by opening them to the elbow, and edging them with a deep pleated ruffle, either of the material of the dress or of that used for the trimmings; this ruffle enlarges the sleeve considerably, and gives it a fashionable air.

The present réunions, evenings at the Theâtre Italien or the opera, large dinner-parties, etc., seem devoted to black. One passes in review there all the possible and impossible combinations of black toilettes—black crape over black satin; black velvet dresses, low-necked, and without sleeves, over which is worn a polonaise of black blonde, half-high, and with no other sleeves than a fall of the same blonde, set on the shoulder; and black Chambéry gauze over black faille, the gauze being entirely covered with embroidery of black jet. For coiffure is a very high black jet comb and a Spanish mantilla. Black jet bracelets. This last toilette was worn the other evening at the Theâtre Italien by a very light blonde beauty.

For ball toilettes is announced the use of organdy, so dear to our grandmothers, and so much neglected for the last half century, owing to the intriguing tarlatan that has taken its place. Between ourselves be it said, the two stuffs resemble each other as closely as twin sisters that can hardly be distinguished apart. But the revival of organdy is certain, and I will describe a dress for a young girl, lately made of this fabric, so old that it is quite new.

Plain skirt of white taffeta, worn under a skirt of white organdy, trimmed with a pleated flounce, surmounted by a puff. All of the back breadths are covered with puffs to the waist. The tablier is covered with puffs, separated by a space equal to their width, while those of the back are seperated only by a slender pink roll. A pink ribbon is run through each puff of the tablier, and finished at the ends by square bows (that is, the two ends are equal in length to the two loops which compose the bow). A pink ribbon is run through the puff which surmounts the lower flounce, but only on the part that belongs to the tablier. Low waist, pointed in front and behind, and edged in the neck with two puffs, with pink ribbon run through each, and finished with a pleated ruffle. Between these two puffs is a slender wreath of leaves and very small pink daisies. Very short sleeves, composed of a single puff. Long white gloves, with sixteen buttons. Hair dressed very high, and crowned with a small chaplet of pink daisies. The same flowers are set here and there in the hair. Necklace of small daisies, epaulet of daisies on the left shoulder.

GENERAL FEATURES OF THE WINTER FASHIONS.

All kinds of wrappings will be worn. Long narrow cloaks, with sleeves and cape or hood, or without either, are extremely in favor with the plutocracy of Paris—that is, the part of the Faubourg St. Germain which prides itself on keeping aloof from the eccentric elegance of the financial world.

Bonnets are more and more round high toques, sometimes with three stories, one above another, formed of the diadem, the crown, and the trimming (feathers and bows arranged in a tuft), which surmounts the whole, and looks precisely like the bouquet which the Paris masons are accustomed to set on the top of the edifice they have just completed. The hair is still combed very high, and must all be contained in the crown of the bonnet.

Belts (which, to speak accurately, are nothing but sashes, since they are no longer used merely to gird the waist) are fourteen, sixteen, and even twenty inches wide, and are made of double-faced ribbon, satin on one side and velvet on the other, or else of two colors, pink or blue on one side and black on the other.

Petticoats for walking costumes are of black woolen moiré; the more elegant ones are trimmed with a flounce of black velveteen cut on the bias, slightly gathered, and set on with a heading. They are worn with suits, or with a black velveteen skirt and a polonaise of any kind of material.

The most fashionable trimming is narrow fur fringe, gray, brown, or black. This trimming is seen on polonaises of every kind, wool, velvet, and silk. It is generally set under a scalloped edge; or, if the garment is of cloth, the edge is cut in points. When the polonaise is trimmed in this manner, the skirt that accompanies it is bordered on the bottom with three flat bias folds, the lower edge of which is cut in scallops, under which is set fur fringe, gray or brown for black fabrics, black for dark blue or brown, olive green, etc.

The following will serve for the type of a pretty toilette: Long skirt of striped pékin velvet, of two shades of bronze. Eight inches from the lower edge are set large semicircles of light bronze ribbon. Above these semicircles is a bias flounce of the material, surmounted by three bias folds of the same fabric. Over-skirt, short in front and drawn backward, of plain dark bronze velvet; this over-skirt is draped underneath so as to form a very large pouf. Plain waist, pointed in front and behind, of the same velvet as the over-skirt, with sleeves of striped velvet, like that of the long skirt. Under the pouf of the over-skirt the flounce of the long skirt is slightly caught up under a mammoth bow of striped velvet formed of two loops, each twenty-four inches wide (the whole width of the stuff), and two ends of the same width, but longer than the loops.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

(Continued from No. 48, page 759.)

LADY ANNA.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE SERGEANT AND MRS. BLUESTONE AT HOME.

LADY ANNA was not told till the Saturday that she was to meet her lover, the tailor, on the following Monday. She was living at this time, as it were, in chains, though the chains were gilded. It was possible that she might be off at any moment with Daniel Thwaite—and now the more possible because he had money at his command. If this should occur, then would the game which the Countess and her friends were playing be altogether lost. Then would the checkmate have been absolute. The reader will have known that such a step had never been contemplated by the man, and will also have perceived that it would have been altogether opposed to the girl's character; but it is hoped that the reader has looked more closely into the man's motives and the girl's character than even her mother was able to do. The Countess had thought that she had known her daughter. She had been mistaken, and now there was hardly any thing of which she could not suspect her girl to be capable. Lady Anna was watched, therefore, during every minute of the four-and-twenty hours. A policeman was told off to protect the house at night from rope-ladders or any other less cumbrous ingenuity. The servants were set on guard. Sarah, the lady's-maid, followed her mistress almost like a ghost when the poor young lady went to her bedroom. Mrs. Bluestone, or one of the girls, was always with her, either in-doors or out-of-doors. Out-of-doors, indeed, she never went without more guards than one. A carriage had been hired—a luxury with which Mrs. Bluestone had hitherto dispensed—and the carriage was always there when Lady Anna suggested that she should like to leave the house. She was warmly invited to go shopping, and made to understand that in the way of ordinary shopping she could buy what she pleased. But her life was inexpressibly miserable. "What does mamma mean to do?" she said to Mrs. Bluestone on the Saturday morning.

"In what way, my dear?"

"Where does she mean to go? She won't live always in Keppel Street?"

"No, I do not think that she will live always in Keppel Street. It depends a good deal upon you, I think."

"I will go wherever she pleases to take me. The lawsuit is over now, and I don't know why we should stay here. I am sure you can't like it."

To tell the truth, Mrs. Bluestone did not like it at all. Circumstances had made her a jailer, but by nature she was very ill constituted for that office. The harshness of it was detestable to her, and then there was no reason whatever why she should sacrifice her domestic comfort for the Lovels. The thing had grown upon them, till the Lovels had become an incubus to her. Personally, she liked Lady Anna, but she was unable to treat Lady Anna as she would treat any other girl that she liked. She had told the Sergeant more than once that she could not endure it much longer. And the Sergeant did not like it better than did his wife. It was all a labor of love, and a most unpleasant labor. "The Countess must take her away," the Sergeant had said. And now the Sergeant had been told by the tailor, in his own chambers, that his word was worth nothing!

"To tell you the truth, Lady Anna, we none of us like it—not because we do not like you, but because the whole thing is disagreeable. You are creating very great misery, my dear, because you are obstinate."

"Because I won't marry my cousin?"

"No, my dear, not because you won't marry your cousin. I have never advised you to marry your cousin, unless you could love him. I don't think girls should ever be told to marry this man or that. But it is very proper that they should be told not to marry this man or that. You are making every body about you miserable, because you will not give up a most improper engagement, made with a man who is in every respect beneath you."

"I wish I were dead," said Lady Anna.

"It is very easy to say that, my dear; but what you ought to wish is to do your duty."

"I do wish to do my duty, Mrs. Bluestone."

"It can't be dutiful to stand out against your mother in this way. You are breaking your mother's heart. And if you were to do this thing, you would soon find that you had broken your own. It is downright obstinacy. I don't like to be harsh, but as you are here, in my charge, I am bound to tell you the truth."

"I wish mamma would let me go away," said Lady Anna, bursting into tears.

"She will let you go at once, if you will only make the promise that she asks of you." In saying this Mrs. Bluestone was hardly more upon the square than her husband had been, for she knew very well, at that moment, that Lady Anna was to go to Keppel Street early on the Monday morning, and she had quite made up her mind that her guest should not come back to Bedford Square. She had now been moved to the special severity which she had shown by certain annoyances of her own to which she had been subjected by the presence of Lady Anna in her house. She could neither entertain her friends nor go out to be entertained by them, and had told the Sergeant more than once that a great mistake had been made in having the girl there at all. But judgment had operated with her as well as feeling. It was necessary that Lady Anna should be made to understand before she saw the tailor that she could not be happy, could not be comfortable, could not be other than very wretched, till she had altogether dismissed her low-born lover.

"I did not think you would be so unkind to me," sobbed Lady Anna through her tears.

"I do not mean to be unkind, but you must be told the truth. Every minute that you spend in thinking of that man is a disgrace to you."

"Then I shall be disgraced all my life," said Lady Anna, bursting out of the room.

On that day the Sergeant dined at his club, but came home about nine o'clock. It had all been planned so that the information might be given in the most solemn manner possible. The two girls were sitting up in the drawing-room with the guest who, since the conversation in the morning, had only seen Mrs. Bluestone during dinner. First there was the knock at the door, and then, after a quarter of an hour, which was spent up stairs in perfect silence, there came a message. Would Lady Anna have the kindness to go to the Sergeant in the dining-room. In silence she left the room, and in silence descended the broad staircase. The Sergeant and Mrs. Bluestone were sitting on one side of the fireplace, the Sergeant in his own peculiar arm-chair, and the lady close to the fender, while a seat opposite to them had been placed for Lady Anna. The room was gloomy, with dark red curtains and dark flock paper. On the table there burned two candles, and no more. The Sergeant got up and motioned Lady Anna to a chair. As soon as she had seated herself he began his speech. "My dear young lady, you must be no doubt aware that you are at present causing a great deal of trouble to your best friends."

"I don't want to cause any body trouble," said Lady Anna, thinking that the Sergeant, in speaking of her best friends, alluded to himself and his wife. "I only want to go away."

"I am coming to that directly, my dear. I can not suppose that you do not understand the extent of the sorrow that you have inflicted on your parent by—by the declaration which you made to Lord Lovel in regard to Mr. Daniel Thwaite." There is nothing, perhaps, in the way of exhortation and scolding which the ordinary daughter—or son—dislikes so much as to be told of her or his "parent." "My dear fellow, your father will be annoyed," is taken in good part. "What will mamma say?" is seldom received amiss. But when young people have their "parents" thrown at them, they feel themselves to be aggrieved, and become at once antagonistic. Lady Anna became strongly antagonistic. If her mother, who had always been to her her "own, own mamma," was going to be her parent, there must be an end of all hope of happiness. She said nothing, but compressed her lips together. She would not allow herself to be led an inch any way by a man who talked to her of her parent. "The very idea of such a marriage as this man had suggested to you under the guise of friendship was dreadful to her. It could be no more than an idea; but that you should have entertained it was dreadful. She has since asked you again and again to repudiate the idea, and hitherto you have refused to obey."

"I can never know what mamma really wants till I go and live with her again."

"I am coming to that, Lady Anna. The Countess has informed Mrs. Bluestone that you had refused to give the desired promise unless you should be allowed to see Mr. Daniel Thwaite, intimating, I presume, that his permission would be necessary to free you from your imaginary bond to him."

"It would be necessary."

"Very well. The Countess naturally felt an abhorrence at allowing you again to be in the presence of one so much beneath you—who had ventured to address you as he has done. It was a most natural feeling. But it has occurred to Mrs. Bluestone and myself that, as you entertain this idea of an obligation, you should be allowed to extricate yourself from it after your own fashion. You are to meet Mr. Thwaite—on Monday—at eleven o'clock—in Keppel Street."

"And I am not to come back again?"

When one executes the office of jailer without fee or reward, giving up to one's prisoner one's best bedroom, and having a company dinner, more or less, cooked for one's prisoner every day, one does not like to be told too plainly of the anticipated joys of enfranchisement. Mrs. Bluestone, who had done her best both for the mother and the girl, and had done it all from pure motherly sympathy, was a little hurt. "I am sure, Lady Anna, we shall not wish you to return," she said.

"Oh, Mrs. Bluestone, you don't understand me. I don't think you know how unhappy I am because of mamma."

Mrs. Bluestone relented at once. "If you will only do as your mamma wishes, every thing will be made happy for you."

"Mr. Thwaite will be in Keppel Street at eleven o'clock on Monday," continued the Sergeant, "and an opportunity will then be given you of obtaining from him a release from that unfortunate promise which I believe you once made him. I may tell you that he has expressed himself willing to give you that release. The debt due to him, or rather to his late father, has now been paid by the estate, and I think you will find that he will make no difficulty. After that, any thing that he may require shall be done to forward his views."

"Am I to take my things?" she asked.

"Sarah shall pack them up, and they shall be sent after you if it be decided that you are to stay with Lady Lovel." They then went to bed.

In all this neither the Sergeant nor his wife had been "on the square." Neither of them had spoken truly to the girl. Mrs. Bluestone had let the Countess know that with all her desire to assist her ladyship and her ladyship's daughter, she could not receive Lady Anna back in Bedford Square. As for that sending of her things upon certain conditions, it was a simple falsehood. The things would certainly be sent. And the Sergeant, without uttering an actual lie, had endeavored to make the girl think that the tailor was in pursuit of money—and of money only, though he must have known that it was not so. The Sergeant no doubt hated a lie—as most of us do hate lies; and had a strong conviction that the devil is the father of them. But then the lies which he hated, and as to the parentage of which he was quite certain, were lies told to him. Who yet ever met a man who did not in his heart of hearts despise an attempt made by others to deceive—himself? They whom we have found to be gentler in their judgment toward attempts made in another direction have been more than one or two. The object which the Sergeant had in view was so good that it seemed to him to warrant some slight deviation from parallelogrammatic squareness—though he held it as one of his first rules of life that the end can not justify the means.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

IT IS STILL TRUE.

ON Sunday they all went to church, and not a word was said about the tailor. Alice Bluestone was tender and valedictory; Mrs. Bluestone was courteous and careful; the Sergeant was solemn and civil. Before the day was over Lady Anna was quite sure that it was not intended that she should come back to Bedford Square. Words were said by the two girls, and by Sarah, the waiting-maid, which made it certain that the packing up was to be a real packing up. No hinderance was offered to her when she busied herself about her own dresses, and folded up her stock of gloves and ribbons. On Monday morning after breakfast Mrs. Bluestone nearly broke down. "I am sure, my dear," she said, "we have liked you very much, and if there has been any thing uncomfortable, it has been from unfortunate circumstances." The Sergeant bade God bless her when he walked off half an hour before the carriage came to take her, and she knew that she was to sit no longer as a guest at the Sergeant's table. She kissed the girls, was kissed by Mrs. Bluestone, got into the carriage with the maid, and in her heart said good-by to Bedford Square forever.

It was but three minutes' drive from the Sergeant's house to that in which her mother lived, and in that moment of time she was hardly able to realize the fact that within half an hour she would be once more in the presence of Daniel Thwaite. She did not at present at all understand why this thing was to be done. When last she had seen her mother the Countess had solemnly declared, had almost sworn, that they two should never see each other again. And now the meeting was so close at hand that the man must already be near her. She put up her face to the carriage window as though she almost expected to see him on the pavement. And how would the meeting be arranged? Would her mother be present? She took it for granted that her mother would be present. She certainly anticipated no pleasure from the meeting—though she would be glad, very glad, to see Daniel Thwaite once again. Before she had time to answer herself a question the carriage had stopped, and she could see her mother at the drawing-room window. She trembled as she went up stairs, and hardly could speak when she found herself in her mother's presence. If her mother had worn the old brown gown it would have been better; but there she was, arrayed in black silk—in silk that was new and stiff and broad and solemn—a parent rather than a mother, and every inch a countess. "I am so glad to be with you again, mamma."

"I shall not be less glad to have you with me, Anna—if you will behave yourself with propriety."

"Give me a kiss, mamma." Then the Countess bent her head and allowed her daughter's lips to touch her cheeks. In old days—days that were not so very old—she would kiss her child as though such embraces were the only food that nourished her.

Hosted by Google

"Come up stairs and I will show you your room." Then the daughter followed the mother in solemn silence. "You have heard that Mr. Daniel Thwaite is coming here to see you at your own request. It will not be many minutes before he is here. Take off your bonnet." Again Lady Anna silently did as she was bid. "It would have been better—very much better—that you should have done as you were desired without subjecting me to this indignity. But as you have taken into your head an idea that you can not be absolved from an impossible engagement without his permission, I have submitted. Do not let it be long, and let me hear then that all this nonsense is over. He has got what he desires, as a very large sum of money has been paid to him." Then there came a knock at the door from Sarah, who just showed her face to say that Mr. Thwaite was in the room below. "Now go down. In ten minutes I shall expect to see you here again—or, after that, I shall come down to you." Lady Anna took her mother by the hand, looking up with beseeching eyes into her mother's face. "Go, my dear, and let this be done as quickly as possible. I believe that you have too great a sense of propriety to let him do more than speak to you. Remember—you are the daughter of an earl; and remember also all that I have done to establish your right for you."

"Mamma, I do not know what to do. I am afraid."

"Shall I go with you, Anna?"

"No, mamma; it will be better without you. You do not know how good he is."

"If he will abandon this madness, he shall be my friend of friends."

"Oh, mamma, I am afraid. But I had better go." Then, trembling, she left the room and slowly descended the stairs. She had certainly spoken the truth in saying that she was afraid. Up to this moment she had not positively made up her mind whether she would or would not yield to the entreaties of her friends. She had decided upon nothing—leaving, in fact, the arbitrament of her fate in the hands of the man who had now come to see her. Throughout all that had been said and done her sympathies had been with him, and had become the stronger the more her friends had reviled him. She knew that they had spoken evil of him, not because he was evil, but with the unholy view of making her believe what was false. She had seen through all this, and had been aroused by it to a degree of firmness of which her mother had not imagined her to be capable. Had they confined themselves to the argument of present fitness, admitting the truth and honesty of the man—and admitting also that his love for her and hers for him had been the natural growth of the familiar friendship of their childhood and youth—their chance of moulding her to their purposes would have been better. As it was, they had never argued with her on the subject without putting forward some statement which she found herself bound to combat. She was told continually that she had degraded herself; and she could understand that another Lady Anna might degrade herself most thoroughly by listening to the suit of a tailor. But she had not disgraced herself. Of that she was sure, though she could not well explain to them her reasons when they accused her. Circumstances, and her mother's mode of living, had thrown her into intimacy with this man. For all practical purposes of life he had been her equal—and, being so, had become her dearest friend. To take his hand, to lean on his arm, to ask his assistance, to go to him in her troubles, to listen to his words and to believe them, to think of him as one who might always be trusted, had become a second nature to her. Of course she loved him. And now the martyrdom through which she had passed in Bedford Square had changed—unconsciously as regarded her own thoughts—but still had changed her feelings in regard to her cousin. He was not to her now the bright and shining thing, the godlike Phœbus, which he had been in Wyndham Street and at Yoxham. In all their lectures to her about her title and grandeur they had succeeded in inculcating an idea of the solemnity of rank, but had robbed it in her eyes of all its grace. She had only been the more tormented because the fact of her being Lady Anna Lovel had been fully established. The feeling in her bosom which was most hostile to the tailor's claim upon her was her pity for her mother.

She entered the room very gently, and found him standing by the table, with his hands clasped together. "Sweetheart!" he said, as soon as he saw her, calling her by a name which he used to use when they were out in the fields together in Cumberland.

"Daniel!" Then he came to her and took her hand. "If you have any thing to say, Daniel, you must be very quick, because mamma will come in ten minutes."

"Have you any thing to say, sweetheart?" She had much to say, if she only knew how to say it; but she was silent. "Do you love me, Anna?" Still she was silent. "If you have ceased to love me, pray tell me so, in all honesty." But yet she was silent. "If you are true to me, as I am to you, with all my heart, will you not tell me so?"

"Yes," she murmured.

He heard her, though no other could have done so.

"A lover's ears will hear the lowest sound
When the suspicious head of theft is stopped."

"If so," said he, again taking her hand, "this story they have told me is untrue."

"What story, Daniel?" But she withdrew her hand quickly as she asked him.

"Nay, it is mine; it shall be mine if you love me, dear. I will tell you what story. They have said that you love your cousin, Earl Lovel."

"No," said she, scornfully, "I have never said so. It is not true."

"You can not love us both." His eye was fixed upon hers, that eye to which in past years she had been accustomed to look for guidance, sometimes in joy and sometimes in fear, and which she had always obeyed. "Is not that true?"

"Oh yes, that is true, of course."

"You have never told him that you loved him."

"Oh, never."

"But you have told me so—more than once; eh, sweetheart?"

"Yes."

"And it was true?"

She paused a moment, and then gave him the same answer, "Yes."

"And it is still true?"

She repeated the word a third time. "Yes." But she again so spoke that none but a lover's ear could have heard it.

"If it be so, nothing but the hand of God shall separate us. You know that they sent for me to come here." She nodded her head. "Do you know why? In order that I might abandon my claim to your hand. I will never give it up. But I made them a promise, and I will keep it. I told them that if you preferred Lord Lovel to me, I would at once make you free of your promise—that I would offer to you such freedom, if it would be freedom. I do offer it to you—or rather, Anna, I would have offered it, had you not already answered the question. How can I offer it now?" Then he paused, and stood regarding her with fixed eyes. "But there—there; take back your word if you will. If you think that it is better to be the wife of a lord, because he is a lord, though you do not love him, than to lie upon the breast of the man you do love, you are free from me." Now was the moment in which she must obey her mother, and satisfy her friends, and support her rank, and decide that she would be one of the noble ladies of England, if such decision were to be made at all. She looked up into his face, and thought that after all it was handsomer than that of the young Earl. He stood thus with dilated nostrils, and fire in his eyes, and his lips just parted, and his head erect—a very man. Had she been so minded, she would not have dared to take his offer. They surely had not known the man when they allowed him to have this interview. He repeated his words. "You are free if you will say so—but you must answer me."

"I did answer you, Daniel."

"My noble girl! And now, my heart's only treasure, I may speak out and tell you what I think. It can not be good that a woman should purchase rank and wealth by giving herself to a man she does not love. It must be bad—monstrously bad. I never believed it when they told it me of you. And yet when I did not hear of you or see you for months—"

"It was not my fault."

"No, sweetheart—and I tried to find comfort by so saying to myself. 'If she really loves me, she will be true,' I said. And yet who was I that I should think that you would suffer so much for me? But I will repay you—if the truth and service of a life may repay such a debt as that. At any rate, hear this from me—I will never doubt again." As he spoke he was moving toward her, thinking to take her in his arms, when the door was opened and Countess Lovel was within the room. The tailor was the first to speak. "Lady Lovel, I have asked your daughter, and I find that it is her wish to adhere to the engagement which she made with me in Cumberland. I need hardly say that it is my wish also."

"Anna! Is this true?"

"Mamma, mamma! Oh, mamma!"

"If it be so, I will never speak word to you more."

"You will; you will! Do not look at me like that. You will speak to me!"

"You shall never again be child of mine." But in saying this she had forgotten herself, and now she remembered her proper cue. "I do not believe a word of it. The man has come here and has insulted and frightened you. He knows—he must know—that such a marriage is impossible. It can never take place. It shall never take place. Mr. Thwaite, as you are a living man, you shall never live to marry my daughter."

"My lady, in this matter of marriage your daughter must no doubt decide for herself. Even now, by all the laws of God—and I believe of man too—she is beyond your control either to give her in marriage or to withhold her. In a few months she will be as much her own mistress as you now are yours."

"Sir, I am not asking you about my child. You are insolent."

"I came here, Lady Lovel, because I was sent for."

"And now you had better leave us. You made a promise which you have broken."

"By heavens, no. I made a promise, and I have kept it. I said that I would offer her freedom, and I have done so. I told her, and I tell her again now, that if she will say that she prefers her cousin to me, I will retire." The Countess looked at him and also recognized the strength of his face, almost feeling that the man had grown in personal dignity since he had received the money that was due to him. "She does not prefer the Earl. She has given her heart to me; and I hold it—and will hold it. Look up, dear, and tell your mother whether what I say be true."

"It is true," said Lady Anna.

"Then may the blight of hell rest upon you both!" said the Countess, rushing to the door. But she returned. "Mr. Thwaite," she said, "I will trouble you at once to leave the house, and never more to return to it."

"I will leave it, certainly. Good-by, my own love." He attempted again to take the girl by the hand, but the Countess, with violence, rushed at them and separated them.

"If you but touch him, I will strike you," she said to her daughter. "As for you, it is her money that you want. If it be necessary, you shall have, not hers, but mine. Now go."

"That is a slander, Lady Lovel. I want no one's money. I want the girl I love—whose heart I have won; and I will have her. Good-morning, Lady Lovel. Dear, dear Anna, for this time good-by. Do not let any one make you think that I can ever be untrue to you." The girl only looked at him. Then he left the room, and the mother and the daughter were alone together. The Countess stood erect, looking at her child, while Lady Anna, standing also, kept her eyes fixed upon the ground. "Am I to believe it all—all that man says?" asked the Countess.

"Yes, mamma."

"Do you mean to say that you have renewed your engagement with that low-born wretch?"

"Mamma—he is not a wretch."

"Do you contradict me? After all, is it come to this?"

"Mamma—you, you—cursed me."

"And you will be cursed. Do you think that you can do such wickedness as this, that you can destroy all that I have done for you, that you make yourself the cause of ruin to a whole family, and that you will not be punished for it? You say that you love me."

"You know that I love you, mamma."

"And yet you do not scruple to drive me mad."

"Mamma, it was you who brought us together."

"Ungrateful child! Where else could I take you then?"

"But I was there—and of course I loved him. I could not cease to love him because—because they say that I am a grand lady."

"Listen to me, Anna. You shall never marry him; never. With my own hands I will kill him first—or you." The girl stood looking into her mother's face, and trembling. "Do you understand that?"

"You do not mean it, mamma."

"By the God above me, I do! Do you think that I will stop at any thing now—after having done so much? Do you think that I will live to see my daughter the wife of a foul, sweltering tailor? No, by heavens! He tells you that when you are twenty-one you will not be subject to my control. I warn you to look to it. I will not lose my control, unless when I see you married to some husband fitting your condition in life. For the present you will live in your own room, as I will live in mine. I will hold no intercourse whatever with you, till I have constrained you to obey me."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

ICELAND has altogether the start of America. We propose to celebrate our nation's centennial in 1876; but meanwhile, from the land of snow and ice, volcanoes and geysers, comes the intelligence that the Icelanders propose to celebrate their millennial in 1874. In 874 Ingolf, a Norwegian chief, planted a small colony on that island, which had been discovered a few years before. In about half a century many thousands of hardy settlers had established themselves on this cold and barren isle. At one time the population numbered no less than 100,000; but the inhabitants have suffered greatly from famines, epidemics, and volcanic casualties, and the number is now reduced to about 60,000. Iceland contains an area of 40,000 square miles, of which the glaciers cover a surface of upward of 4000 square miles; and there are thirty known volcanoes, of which eight have been active within a century. There are also numerous thermal springs, the principal of which is the Great Geyser, in which the water, at a depth of seventy-two feet, is thirty degrees above the boiling-point. Water and stones are thrown at intervals from this geyser to a height of 100 feet. No grain of any kind can be raised in Iceland, but vegetables can be cultivated, and fish and birds are abundant. Forests formerly abounded, but now the island is almost destitute of trees, and the want of fuel is severely felt. The islanders are of the Scandinavian race, and are by no means lacking in intellectual capacity. Although there are but few educational institutions, domestic education is universal, and the people are intelligent. Many of the most valuable works of English literature have been translated into the native tongue, and are read and appreciated by the common people. All the inhabitants believe the doctrines of the Reformation in their primitive simplicity, and the majority of them are Lutherans in profession. In short, the Icelanders are as prosperous as could be expected of any people living in such a barren country, and deserve a national festival.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, there were 264,936 packages of stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and post-office envelopes sent through the post-office from the agencies in New York and Springfield, of which immense amount only four packages were lost, the value of which was only $67 45. This statement certainly reflects great credit upon the officials of the department.

Experiments have now been carried so far that it is manifest all the raisins needed for consumption in the United States can be made in California. Although grapes can be converted into raisins more rapidly by artificial means, that is not necessary; the process may be very simple, though there are many small details to be attended to carefully. It is believed that grape-growers will realize more profit from their vineyards in California by giving their attention to the production of raisins than of wine, since only experts can make wine profitably.

It is not often that an Anglo-Indian station is the scene of so brilliant a wedding as recently took place at Bangalore, Colonel Prettejohn, commanding a regiment of hussars, being the bridegroom, and the bride the daughter of an officer of the Madras infantry. The church in which the ceremony was performed was crammed with spectators, the soldiers of the regiment, in full dress, being present, in addition to a wedding party of goodly size. Conspicuous on the wedding breakfast-table towered a magnificent cake, supplied by an English confectioner, and which reached its destination in India in perfect condition, sugar and all, though it traveled through the Red Sea during the hottest season.

A rumor comes from Indiana that 3000 volumes have been stolen from the State Library. Nobody missed them until the last ones were gone.

A curious case of feigning sickness recently occurred in Liverpool, England. Application was made at the work-house for the admission of a seaman suffering from cholera. He was removed from the ship where he was, and taken to the hospital, where great preparations were made for his safe reception, and the disinfection of his clothing. He appeared in a collapsed state, but the next morning had quite recovered. The suspicions of the physicians were aroused, and it was discovered that he did not wish to sail in the ship, and had therefore taken an enormous dose of salts, which produced the symptoms mentioned.

The new water-works were lately opened in Vienna, in the presence of the Emperor and many high officials. The water comes from the Alps, a distance of fifty-four English miles. Three and a half years have been spent upon these works, which have cost twenty million florins.

The Library of the British Museum contains over 1,000,000 volumes, and an equal number of pamphlets and manuscripts. In the main reading-room there are about 100,000 of the most desirable books for common use, but none of the rare and curious ones. This reading-room is an immense dome 140 feet in diameter, containing seats and desks for about five hundred readers. No books are allowed to be taken out of the building.

Since the yellow fever began its death-work in Memphis last September nearly two thousand citizens of that place have died. What an army of dependent widows and children have thus been thrown upon the charity of strangers!

The facility with which Sir Edwin Landseer produced his pictures was remarkable. Many instances are known of his extreme rapidity of execution. In an English gallery which contains many works by this artist are two which are peculiarly illustrative of this quality: one is a spaniel rushing out of a thicket with a wounded rabbit. The rabbit and dog are of the size of life. They have the fullest appearance of completeness, yet the picture was painted in two hours and a half. The other picture is of a fallow deer, and of the size of life, painted down to the knees. Mr. Wells, to whom these pictures belonged, used to relate that on leaving the house to go to Penshurst Church, the panel for this picture was being placed on the easel by his butler, and on his return, in about three hours, the painting was complete—so complete, indeed, that it is more than doubtful if equal truth of imitation could have resulted from a more labored execution. Another instance of rapidity of execution is a portrait of the second Lord Ashburton. It is a three-quarter view, painted on canvas thirty-six inches high by twenty-eight inches wide, and it is stated to have been executed in a single sitting.

We have read and heard many poetical and beautiful descriptions of the Indian summer days, but the following, which comes all the way from Kansas, is new and unique: "The happy, quiet, sleepy, yellow, spider-webby days known as 'Indian summer' are here in the perfection of laziness."

During the prevalence of the yellow fever in Memphis a Nashville man had occasion to go to that city over the Northwestern Railroad. There were but few passengers, and after nightfall the conductor went and sat down by him in a friendly way.

"Goin' to Memphis, are you, stranger?" he asked.

"Yes, Sir," said the Nashville man.

"Mighty rough road, ain't it?" queried the conductor, with a yawn.

"Very," was the reply.

"Last time I went over the road this car we're in was upset, and a man was killed all to smash," said the communicative ticket-puncher, with another yawn. Then he added, as if it were a bit of comfort, "I've got the most reckless engineer on the road with me to-night, too; but I hope we won't have any accidents."

"I certainly hope we will not," responded the passenger, with a slight feeling of uneasiness.

"Well, I don't know as it would make much difference to you," said the conductor, cheerfully: "you'll die any way, if you're goin' to Memphis."

Naples will be a popular resort during the winter season. Many families have gone there, not merely as casual visitors, but for a long sojourn. It is also stated that both the Empress of Russia and the German Empress will spend the greater part of next winter in the neighborhood of Naples.

Forests continue to disappear in various parts of the civilized world. Extensive fires are reported as spreading in the forests of Asia Minor. It is a custom of the peasantry to burn down the woods for the purpose of turning the land into pasturage. A large forest of pines on the mountain Nymph-Dagh was recently consumed, and in the vicinity of Smyrna a plantation of 3000 olive-trees has been destroyed through the carelessness of the people. One of the most magnificent forests in the island of Candia has also been lately utterly consumed.

The Congregationalist, which tells of a minister who prayed forty minutes at a funeral, gives this valuable advice to all clergymen, "Be brief."

A university, modeled after those of Oxford and Cambridge, is about being established at Calcutta by the Mohammedans of India.

Hosted by Google

Ladies' Winter Bonnets, Figs. 1–6.

See Figs. 4, 5, and 6 on page 793.

Figs. 1 and 4.—BLACK VELVET BONNET. This bonnet is made of black velvet and pearl gray faille, and is furnished with a revers, which forms a deep point in front, and which is covered with gathered velvet. Underneath the revers is set a bow of faille lined with velvet, and on the right side of the bonnet a small spray of tea-roses. Above the revers is a large bow of faille and velvet. The remainder of the trimming consists of wound strips of velvet and faille, a long black feather, and strings of black gros grain ribbon. Black marceline lining.

Figs. 2 and 3.—BROWN VELVET BONNET. On this brown velvet bonnet is set a revers of the same material, which is bent down in a point in front, and bound on the outer edge with brown faille half an inch wide; on the front edge of the revers, on the outside, this binding is trimmed with two folds each half an inch wide, which overlap each other to one-half their width. The seam made by setting on the revers is covered with a wound strip of brown faille; the high standing loops on the right side of the bonnet and the hanging loops in the back are also of brown faille. Besides this the bonnet is trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with wreaths of roses of different colors and grape leaves, an aigrette of pink heron and ostrich feathers, and on the right side, underneath the revers, with bows of pink faille. Strings of brown gros grain ribbon, and black lustring lining.

Fig. 2.—BROWN VELVET BONNET.—BACK. [See Fig. 3.]

Fig. 1.—BLACK VELVET BONNET. BACK.—[See Fig. 4, Page 793.]

Figs. 5 and 6.—GREEN FAILLE BONNET. This bonnet of dark green faille is trimmed with loops and bows of the material and of faille in a lighter shade. The outer edge of the bonnet is covered on the outside and inside with a bias strip of light green faille an inch and a quarter wide; the strip on the inside is pleated in front in the form of a ruche. The bonnet is also edged with a beaded border and grelots. The back of the bonnet is turned up in a revers. The remainder of the trimming consists of a green shaded ostrich feather and sprays of pale pink roses. Strings of dark green faille. Black marceline lining.

Fig. 3.—BROWN VELVET BONNET.—FRONT. [See Fig. 2.]

Ladies' Winter Dresses, Figs. 1–4.

Fig. 1.—BLACK VELVET JACKET, trimmed with gros grain folds and buttons, black guipure lace, and passementerie agrafes. White Swiss muslin and lace undersleeves.

Fig. 2.—STEEL BLUE CLOTH DOUBLE-BREASTED BASQUE, furnished with a revers collar of gros grain

Fig. 1.—BLACK VELVET JACKET. Fig. 2.—STEEL BLUE CLOTH DOUBLE-BREASTED BASQUE. Fig. 3.—SILK AND CASHMERE HOUSE DRESS. Fig. 4.—BLACK FAILLE HOUSE DRESS.

FIGS. 1–4.—LADIES' WINTER DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

of the same color and steel buttons. White linen fraise and under-sleeves.

Fig. 3.—SILK AND CASHMERE HOUSE DRESS. The skirt of this dress is of brown silk, and is trimmed with kilt-pleated ruffles of the material. The over-skirt and waist are made of cashmere of a lighter shade, cut in scallops and bound with brown silk, and trimmed, besides, with rolls of the latter. Brown silk buttons serve for closing. White crêpe lisse fraise.

Fig. 4.—BLACK FAILLE HOUSE DRESS, trimmed with folds and bows of the material, black guipure lace, and passementerie buttons. White tulle fraise and red gros grain cravat bow.

Evening Coiffures, Figs. 1–5.

Fig. 1. — COIFFURE OF BLUE RIBBON AND TEA-ROSES. This coiffure consists of a band of stiff lace two inches and a half wide, sloped off toward the ends to a width of an inch and three-quarters, wired on both sides, and covered with pleated pale blue faille. On the front of the band are set several loops and standing ends of blue faille ribbon two inches and seven-eighths wide, and in the back is a bow of similar ribbon. The right side is finished with a spray of tea-roses.

Fig. 5.—GREEN FAILLE BONNET.—BACK.—[See Fig. 6.]

Fig. 4.—BLACK VELVET BONNET. FRONT.—[See Fig. 1, Page 792.]

Fig. 2.—COIFFURE OF GREEN VELVET RIBBON, FEATHERS, AND FLOWERS. This coiffure is arranged on a foundation of stiff lace. It consists of a large bow, with hanging loops and ends of ribbon, two inches wide, which is of dark green velvet on the outside, and light green satin on the wrong side, a white ostrich feather, and a spray of moss-roses.

Fig. 6.—GREEN FAILLE BONNET.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 5.]

Fig. 3. — COIFFURE OF TULLE, LACE, AND CRIMSON RIBBON. This coiffure is arranged on a stiff lace foundation, and consists of gathered black lace two inches and a half wide and bows of crimson gros grain ribbon. In the back is fastened a veil of figured black tulle edged with lace an inch and a quarter wide. Sprays of blackberries finish the coiffure.

Fig. 4. — COIFFURE OF LACE AND PURPLE VELVET RIBBON. This coiffure consists of a

Fig. 1.—COIFFURE OF BLUE RIBBON AND TEA-ROSES. Fig. 3.—COIFFURE OF TULLE, LACE, AND CRIMSON RIBBON. Fig. 2.—COIFFURE OF GREEN VELVET RIBBON, FEATHERS, AND FLOWERS.
Fig. 4.—COIFFURE OF LACE AND PURPLE VELVET RIBBON. Fig. 5.—COIFFURE OF PINK RIBBON, FEATHERS, AND ROSES.

FIGS. 1–5.—EVENING COIFFURES.

Hosted by Google

rosette of black lace three inches and a quarter wide and white lace two inches and a half wide, on the middle of which is set an aigrette of black ostrich and purple heron feathers. On both sides of this rosette are purple velvet ribbons two inches and seven-eighths wide, on which are sewed bows of similar ribbon and white lace, as shown by the illustration. The ends of these ribbons are tied together in the back.

Fig. 5.—COIFFURE OF PINK RIBBON, FEATHERS, AND ROSES. The wreath-shaped foundation of this coiffure is covered partly with box-pleated pink silk ribbon and partly with bows of similar ribbon. The coiffure is trimmed, besides, with a spray of white roses and with pink ostrich feathers. On the back are set loops and ends of pink silk ribbon.

TILL DEATH.

We met amid the yellow sheaves,
When both were young and both were fair;
We plucked the scarlet poppy leaves,
And cast their petals to the air.

We had no thought of all the woes
The morrow's sun might haply bring;
The perfume of youth's heyday rose
Was to our senses ravishing.

The glamour of life's early love
Was on our souls and in our eyes;
We turned no passing glance above
To look for storms or darkened skies.

Ah me! long garnered are the sheaves,
The poppy flowers are sere and dead
And withered have the summer leaves,
And clouds are gathering overhead.

Yet still our trust is firm and true,
Still each leans on the other's arm;
The sky is black that once was blue,
But we have still love's golden charm.

What be life's ills if they be shared
By one true heart we know our own?
If true Love ne'er the rough ways dared,
He never would ascend a throne.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Fitzball.—Sir Henry Holland.—The School-Master abroad.

MR. FITZBALL is dead. If you are not acquainted with that gentleman and his pretensions, you can not have read the Ballads of Bon Gaultier. The question of the laureateship, it is therein agreed, is to be decided by single combat between two champions drawn by lot from all the candidates:

"Eight hundred minstrels slunk away; two hundred staid to draw:
Now Heaven protect the daring knight that pulls the longest straw!
'Tis done! 'tis done! And who hath won? Keep silence, one and all:
The first is William Wordsworth hight, the second Ned Fitzball.
Oft in the melodrama line his prowess hath been shown,
And well throughout the Surrey side his thirst for blood is known.
* * * * * * *
A braver knight, or more renowned in tourney and in hall,
Ne'er brought the upper gallery down than terrible Fitzball."

For all the early operas of Balfe Mr. Edward Fitzball furnished the librettos, and his popularity as a song writer began as early as 1828, when his My Pretty Jane, wedded to Sir Henry Bishop's music, was first sung at Vauxhall Gardens.

Sir Henry Holland is dead: a physician whose extraordinary length of years and continued well-being were a perfect advertisement of the virtues of his own profession. Every year of his life (a habit he persevered in even when long past eighty) he sought some far-distant land, and yet never thereby lost a patient. "I have often found," said he, "on returning from India or Japan, my carriage waiting at the railway station to convey me to some patient even before it took me home." A month before his death he was in St. Petersburg, and on the previous Friday "interviewed" Marshal M'Mahon in Paris, whence he arrived in London with all the latest news about the fusion—to die.

Lord Justice Bovill is also dead. His demise, it is whispered, was hastened by what has retarded every thing else, the Tichborne trial (over the first part of which—the civil case—he presided). At Christmas we are promised that that business will at last be brought to a termination, and people be permitted to speak their minds about it in England, as I have long done to you. I can tell you a little story about this matter that is only at present whispered, and will not be "gossip" here for a week or two. Among the family documents has been discovered a bill sent in to old Sir James Tichborne by his wine-merchant for wine supplied, at the baronet's expense, to one Mrs. Orton, of Wapping. This may point to a connection which explains very much in this curious case both with respect to the defendant's knowledge of the family and that personal likeness to it which some folks have sworn to exist in him.

Education may be a little behindhand in this country, but our boys are ingenious. In an examination in the west last week, a class of forty lads having been set to write out the second commandment, contrived to spell the word "jealous" in twenty-eight different ways—twenty-seven of which (I need not tell you) were unconventional. The same bright youths metamorphosed Pontius Pilate into a "punchit spilit," "bunch of spled" (this was really magnificent), and "punches pilot," while a more advanced pupil described the Estates of the Realm, as those which pertained to the crown. These young gentlemen, it must be owned, did not belong to what we delight to call "the educated classes;" but the following was lately elicited from an under-graduate at one of our universities, who had been required to give his views upon the career of Oliver Cromwell. "He was a bold, bad man, but repented on his death-bed, when he exclaimed, 'If I had served my God as I have served my king, He would not have deserted me in my old age.'" I am inclined to think that this is the happiest confusion of ideas that education has yet effected. R. KEMBLE, of London.

"CAPILLARY" INSANITIES.

THOSE of us who have reached middle age must often have been struck by the odd determination with which conventionalism (especially in dress) sets at defiance all the laws of taste. The genius of the toilette ought to be represented as a perverse imp, with a face of puzzling capriciousness and the nimblest of weather-cocks for a head. The history of capillary extravagances alone might fill half a dozen bulky folio volumes. In the British Museum there is a work, illustrated by magnificent plates, which details the innumerable modes of dressing the hair during the reign of Elizabeth alone; and although the author is not especially garrulous, his production rivals the first editions of Froissart in length, breadth, and thickness. Now let us imagine some enterprising and "learned Theban" who should undertake to write the History of Human Hair, as Austin Caxton undertook to write The History of Human Error, and whither do you think so stupendous a subject would lead him? If, taking his course backward, he deftly disposed of the huge "water-falls" of recent days, escaped strangulation from the enormous periwigs of the Georges, burst through the yard-long "love-locks" of the Merry Monarch (who came at best "from over the water"), was not crushed under the tower-high "plaits" of Louis le Grand, and could see his way beyond the midnight darkness of Italian tresses—suffered in the thirteenth century to sweep the very pavements sometimes, as the fair devotees attended mass—assuredly he would find himself wandering, distracted, lost, among the complex coiffures of the latter-day Roman beauties, and be fitted only for an asylum of imbeciles when finally he stumbled among the bewitching favorites or gay "Heteraï" of the age of Pericles!

Let us particularize a little. At one period in Rome both wives and virgins displayed what we may well term a morbid passion for cultivating (or trying to cultivate) beards. They shaved their faces, and applied to them every species of irritating unguent then known, in order to propagate these unnatural and revolting appendages. Quacks and charm vendors made it their special business to supply the unguents needed, and there is a story in Juvenal of a haughty, rich, and handsome lady of the court whose fair complexion was spotted and disfigured for life by her employment of one of these rascals and his atrocious oils. Now and then some Greek community (affecting eccentricity, perhaps) would sacrilegiously represent Venus herself as bearded, a really extraordinary fact of a bizarre, contradictory aspect, when we reflect upon the proverbial good taste of the Hellenic genius. On the other hand, who can wonder that the warrior Amazons of Lombardy should have delighted in "getting up" tremendous beards, partly artificial, of course, as bugbears to frighten their enemies in battle?

Vanuzzi, in his Italian Records, affirms that during the epoch of highest art in Italy, the lifetime, for example, of such demi-gods as Titian and Paul Veronese, a species of madness prevailed in favor of hair, not auburn, or yellow, or golden, but absolutely and hideously red!

Ah, sweet ladies! matured madame and delicate maiden of this our nineteenth century, whose fashions were never known to violate the laws of taste, or to court attention by the facile devices of extravagance, only figure to yourselves those débonnaire belles of Venice four hundred years ago, laboriously wending their way up the long, narrow, complicated stairs of their palaces, until, having reached the roof, they sink exhausted on the couches expressly placed outside for their convenience, first throwing the masses of their luxuriant hair, well steeped in perfumed oils, over a frame-work of straw, so that the alchemy of sunshine might change the dark locks or the light into the dazzling color esteemed à la mode!

There would these beautiful fanatics—martyrs to the sacred fiat of society—recline, hour after hour, with a sublime patience, worthy, one may venture to hint, of a better cause.

Apropos of this infatuation, we learn, upon the testimony of a writer in one of the back numbers of Putnam or the Atlantic, that the peasants of Ireland have always regarded fiery-hued locks as the ne plus ultra of loveliness.

"An illigant cratur she is," you will hear them remark, "but, by the rock of Cashel, it's a thousand pities she hasn't rid hair!"

"Can any serious or philosophic thinker doubt for a moment," asks one among the shrewdest of our scholars, "that the modern 'water-fall' was foreshadowed by the Roman 'rats?'" And he adds that two thousand years since "Grecian curls" were sported in "Athens not only by women, but by men. Theodoric the younger, King of the Goths, wore his hair in 'toupets à la Grecque,' crimped in front, and combed back."

The Lombard people were noted for their exorbitantly long tresses, falling over their ears, a fashion which brings to mind a very curious German legend related by Sir Walter Scott in the notes, if we err not, to Count Robert of Paris.

Thus runs the legend:

"There was once a king of the Lombards who was particularly proud of his luxuriant side locks. He owned a body-guard o fifty noblemen, each chosen for his singular resemblance to his master. They likewise wore their hair in long flowing tresses.

"Now the queen's apartments, a little distance from the palace, were visited by his royal highness every evening at night-fall. He wore on these occasions a white mantle, so as to hide his features, and gave a special countersign to the sentry at the queen's gates. A certain young gillie of his guard, bold, enterprising, and much interested in the beauty of the queen, concocted a stratagem by which he might obtain, undiscovered, an interview with her.

"Ascertaining that on a particular day the king would return later than usual from the chase, this guardsman (his majesty's 'double' in form and face) wrapped himself at twilight in a white mantle, obtained somehow the countersign, passed the sentry, and coolly entered her majesty's rooms.

"A convenient golden gloom pervaded the place. The air was heavy with perfumes; and there, at a marble table, on which a feast was spread that would have entranced Lucullus and made Apicius almost faint with anticipated delight, sat the ravishingly beautiful queen. She sipped an exquisite wine of Cyprus, and her lord, as she supposed him, was warmly welcomed.

"Our audacious youth made himself perfectly at home, partook of every delicacy, pledged his companion more than once, and, to cap the climax of impudence, actually kissed her at parting.

"He had not been gone five minutes before the king strode past the amazed sentinel, and in his turn entered the queen's apartments.

"'Ah, your majesty,' she murmured—'your majesty does me honor, returning so soon after your kiss of good-night!'

"'Ho! ho!' exclaimed the king; 'there's a rat about, is there? By all that's sacred, we must ferret him out!' Whereupon he hastened to the dormitory in which his fifty guardsmen slept, armed with a dagger and a lantern of complicated slides. Here, in a long row, lay his fifty 'doubles.' The king very cautiously cast his light upon the first bed. He felt the sleeper's heart. 'That's not the villain,' he muttered; 'his sleep is too tranquil.' And so on from bed to bed he crept, feeling each guardsman's heart, with the same result, until he reached the very last couch. 'This is my man,' thought the king, as he felt the guardsman's pulse throbbing tumultuously under his pressure. Up flashed his dagger; but a sudden idea arrested him. 'The impudent, sacrilegious varlet! he ought to die the death unshriven; but—but I'll not kill him now. He shall be fairly tried to-morrow. Meanwhile, my young cockerel, I mark you—thus!' And at the word the flowing locks on the right temple of the youth were severed by one stroke of the king's sharp blade.

"Just as the sun had risen on the following morning the king summoned his fifty guardsmen to parade before him. His majesty was in rather a self-complacent mood. He couldn't help admiring his own great sagacity. But, ye gods of perverseness and imps of discord! what does his majesty behold? Why, as the parade was formed, and the guardsmen passed in single file before him, he could hardly credit his eyes when it became apparent that not one man of all the fifty had any hair on the right side of his head!

"The special guardsman he had detected in the dormitory had been quite conscious of his master's visit, and instinctively appreciated his motive in depriving him of his right side locks. So, as the only means of saving his life, he had risen after the monarch's departure, and, with admirable sang-froid, docked his comrades of their tresses all round.

"Thus it happened that our Lombard king, who in the main was a good fellow, and therefore could not find it in his soul—being open to sweet touches of pity—to execute his entire guard for the fault of one, was cleverly balked of his vengeance, and that audacious young scamp got a queen's kisses, not to speak of the delectable wine of Cyprus, with

'rich salvers full of nectarines,
Dead-ripe pomegranates and Arabian dates,
Peaches and plums, and clusters fresh from vines,
And all imaginable sweets and cates,' with no other punishment than the night's fright, and some trifling uncertainty as to the result of his experiment in the morning."

USEFUL RECIPES.

MINCE-PIES.—Take one pound of the lean of nice tender beef; boil it until thoroughly done. When cold—and there is no objection to letting it stand over a few days—grate it up, when it should furnish about one pint of mince. Add one pint of raisins seeded and chopped, one pint of sugar, brown or white, one pint of imported dried currants washed clean, one pint of finely chopped pippin apples, and the same quantity of fresh beef suet; half a pint of preserved citron cut up very small, a tea-spoonful of salt, a salt-spoonful of black pepper, a dessert-spoonful of mixed cinnamon, mace, cloves, and nutmeg, measured after they have been beaten up together in a mortar; a pint of wine, a pint of sweet cider, and a gill of brandy. Stir the ingredients together until well combined, and use immediately if you choose. If kept in a clean stone jar with a closely fitting cover, good mince-meat will keep until spring, only taking care, if it becomes too dry by the evaporation of the liquors, to add more wine or brandy until it is sufficiently moist. Mince-pies should always be brought to table piping hot, and, of course, depend greatly for their excellence upon the pastry in which they are served. Use deep plates for baking, and allow a pint of the mince-meat to each pie.

DELICIOUS CITRON PUDDING.—Beat until very thick and light the yolks of sixteen fresh eggs. Stir in gradually, beating all the time, three-quarters of a pound of sugar. Then mix in three-quarters of a pound of melted butter, from which all the salt has been previously washed. Now line two deep pie-plates with puff paste. Cut into thin slices some preserved citron, and lay closely over the pastry, leaving a margin, of course, around the edges. Fill with the batter, and bake in an oven whose heat is regular, but not too great. When drawn from the oven, sift over them finely pulverized white sugar. They are good whether eaten hot or cold, and are considered the most dainty and delicate of all puddings.

LADY CAKE.—The whites of sixteen eggs, one pound of sugar, three-quarters of a pound of butter, one pound of flour, one tea-spoonful of extract of bitter almonds or vanilla. To supplement the above recipe, it is well to have some good way in which to use the sixteen whites of eggs there left undisposed of. We find this cake good, and economical when made at the same time with citron puddings. Whisk until they stand alone the sixteen whites of eggs. Cream three-quarters of a pound of butter, into which cream flour until too stiff to stir. Then add alternately egg, flour, and sugar, until all are well combined. Flavor with any seasoning that will not affect the purity of color. Vanilla or extract of bitter almonds is generally chosen. Bake in a one-pound mould. Icing is a great addition to this, as to every cake, and should be applied while the cake is warm.

GRAHAM BISCUIT.—Into three cups of Graham flour and one of white rub well two tea-spoonfuls of cream of tartar and one of soda; when thoroughly mixed, add a tea-spoonful of salt, and one table-spoonful of white sugar. Stir in two cupfuls of new milk, working all with a knife, and using the hands as little as possible. Roll out about half an inch in thickness, cut into cakes, and bake in a quick oven. Equally good cold as hot.

WHITE FRUIT CAKE.—The same proportions of flour, white of egg, and butter as in the preceding recipe. Add one pound of blanched sweet and two ounces of bitter almonds, one pound of citron cut up fine, and one grated cocoa-nut. Beat almonds in a mortar, with a little rose-water to prevent oiling whenever you use them, and flour all fruits in a small portion of that allotted by weight to the recipe you have in hand. Bake this fruit cake with slow heat, using caution not to allow it to burn.

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

BY F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER XX.

THE RETURN.

REUBEN CULWICK rose to greet his second cousin, and to introduce her to John Jennings, who was filling in some Roman candle cases for Mr. Splud's benefit, which was to take place in a fortnight's time at the Saxe-Gotha, after which a faithful settlement of accounts was solemnly promised to all those whom it might concern, and it concerned Mr. Jennings very much indeed.

"I am glad that you have come," said Reuben, heartily.—"John" (to the fire-work-maker), "this is my second-cousin Sarah."

"How d'ye do, marm?" said Mr. Jennings, with a solemn bow.

Sarah Eastbell was very like Sarah Eastbell's ghost as she looked from one to another, and tried hard to raise a smile, without success.

"Can't you find the girl a seat instead of staring at her?" said Lucy, sharply, to her brother, who immediately tendered her his own chair, and began to put away his fire-works.

"You have been ill," said Reuben to his cousin, as she sat down wearily. "How's that?"

"Not ill exactly. A little weak, perhaps," answered Sarah. "I shall be better in a minute."

"I am very glad that you have found her, Lucy," said Reuben to Miss Jennings, who was untying her bonnet strings in rather a violent manner; "you will let me thank you for all the trouble that you have taken?"

Lucy shook her head emphatically.

"I never cared for people's thanks," she answered.

"She has been very good to me," Sarah Eastbell murmured. "I made a mistake when I thought her very hard; but my life's been pretty well all mistakes, I think."

"There's plenty of time before you," said Reuben; "why, life is only just commencing: you're not an old fellow like me, who has worn out life and all his hopes in it."

"Don't mind him," said Lucy Jennings, as the great dark eyes were upturned to Reuben with much wonder in them. "He talks like that at times, and for no reason."

"Perhaps it's a way that I have," said Reuben. "And now, how did Miss Jennings find you?"

"You are not going to worry her into a long statement to-night," said Lucy, interfering. "Can't you see that she is ill?"

"The young woman would like a drop of whisky, perhaps," said John, suddenly producing the bottle from the cupboard in which he had put away his Roman candles.

"You can't think of any thing but whisky," cried his sister, acrimoniously. "Lock your poison up, and be quiet."

"Mr. Reuben, perhaps you—"

"No, thank you, John."

"Well, as it is out, perhaps a thimbleful will not do me any harm," he said, as though some invisible being had pressed him very earnestly not to put it away without tasting it. He filled a small glass, and drank off its contents, and Sarah Eastbell turned to Reuben.

"I don't want any money," she said, with sudden alacrity.

"Well, I haven't asked you to take any," he answered, laughingly.

"She wants rest," muttered Lucy Jennings.

"I don't want rest—only a few hours, that is,"

Digitized by Google

said Sarah, correcting herself; "and then I hope to set off."

"Set off!" repeated Reuben; "where?"

"To Worcester," answered Sarah. "I have been thinking of what you said to me at Potter's Court, and when Tom and his wife left me in the lurch—they went away in the night while I was asleep, as if they had grown suddenly afraid of me—I came to this place, and—"

"And I sent you away," added Lucy, as Sarah Eastbell paused. "That was one of my mistakes. We all make them. Go on."

"I wanted you to take me down to Worcester, then," she said to Reuben, "to stand by me, as you promised that you would, being a good man."

"My dear girl, I am a very bad man. Ask Lucy."

Miss Jennings frowned, and would not see the joke.

"And if you will take me to-morrow—early—I should like it," she continued, speaking with some amount of difficulty. "I can't do very well without you, Sir, or else I would. Besides—"

"Go on."

"Besides, I want you to have the five pounds."

"What five pounds?" asked Reuben; "that I gave your grandmother when—"

"Oh no—not that," said Sarah, "but to pay that one back, and part of which we were obliged to spend. There's five pounds reward offered for me, you know, and you must claim that, for it's through you I'm giving myself up. I shall say you have caught me, and—"

"Here! hold hard—that will do; no more of your highly colored fictions, Cousin Sarah; it's time you gave them up, at any rate," he cried. "And as for the blood-money, upon my honor, you turn me to goose-flesh at the thought of it."

"Why shouldn't you have the money as well as any body else?" said Sarah, reflectively.

"Suppose we argue the case in the morning?"

"As we go to Worcester?" said Sarah; "very well. This good woman who traced me to-day thinks it would be right to tell the truth, but, oh! I can't tell grandmother. You will break it to her, in your best way, won't you?"

"Well, yes."

"And I may rest here to-night?"—turning to Lucy Jennings again.

"You will share my bed," said Lucy.

"And in the morning—"

"'Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof,'" quoted Lucy, solemnly, "and the evil thoughts, the evil judgment, born of this day we will keep from the better days to come, with God to help us in the effort."

She looked at Reuben, as if he had had a share in the evil thoughts and judgment of that day, and was not wholly blameless, and then passed from the room to a little kitchen beyond, where she was heard striking matches so energetically that her brother stood upon tiptoe, and peered through the glass door which divided them.

"Be careful, Lucy," he called out; "there's a tub of preparation under the dresser, and you might blow us all up in a minute."

"Didn't I say the next time you put your rubbish here, instead of in the powder-shed, I'd throw it into the garden?" cried Lucy.

"You certainly mentioned something of the kind; but as it was late, I thought— By George, she's done it!"

The opening of an outer door, and the clattering of something heavy along the gravel-path beyond, was significant of Lucy's being as good as her word; and John Jennings, with his mouth half-way open, listened for a while, and then moved toward the kitchen.

"As it may rain in the night, I think I'll put it under shelter, if you'll excuse me for a moment," he said, with great politeness, as he withdrew.

Reuben turned to his second cousin.

"You are not well, Sarah. How have you been living since we met last?"

"I have been starving almost," said Sarah. "Tom deserted me. He was afraid of me, and ran away, after that night."

"When you saved my life, perhaps."

"Oh, not so bad as that," said Sarah; "Tom would not have hurt you: he's only talk! But that coining gang down stairs—I was afraid of them."

She shivered at what might have happened, Reuben thought, until she kept on shivering, and put one thin hand suddenly to her chin, to stop her teeth from chattering.

"You are cold."

"A little cold—it's the damp cellar, where a poor old woman let me rest last night, that's done it. I shall be better to-morrow."

"You must have food."

Sarah Eastbell turned pale at the suggestion.

"Don't talk of food, please. That good friend of yours made me have something to eat and drink a little while ago, and it has nearly killed me. How good she is, Sir!"

"Yes, I begin to think so," muttered Reuben.

"If you knew how they love her down the dark streets where such as I live!"

"Used to live," said Reuben, correcting her; "that's all gone by now."

"This is beginning again—isn't it?"

"Yes—a new beginning!"

"Opening with a prison, that's the worst of it," said Sarah; "for they won't believe me, it isn't likely. And then afterward—and it's not long for the first offense, I have heard Tom say—there's life again at St. Oswald's, if the committee will let me go to grandmother."

"And then Tom again—sneaking round for money, when he thinks that you have any."

"Poor Tom!" said Sarah, to our hero's surprise, "he only came when he was hard up. For he has a high spirit, Mr. Reuben."

"Very. I am afraid that it is high enough to hang him presently. There, don't look angry; it's only my private opinion, and he's not worth defending. Hasn't he run away from you?—thank Heaven."

"He couldn't trust me," she said, despondently—"not even Tom!" she cried.

"Haven't I trusted you—always?"

The girl looked at him strangely.

"Ah! I shall be never able to understand you, Sir. And yet I have tried hard too."

"Well—do you trust me?"

"God bless you—yes!"

She would have seized his hands and raised them to her lips in a spasmodic burst of gratitude, but he evaded the compliment, and began walking up and down the little room.

"You must remember that we are relations, Sarah—that you have a claim upon me," he said, lightly; "it's no use looking at this seriously. I'm a comic sort of man—fond of my joke, and with an objection to sentiment."

"You tell a great many stories, like me," said his cousin, sadly; "I suppose that it is in the family, and we can't help it."

"If you were not looking so woe-begone, I should set that down for 'chaff,'" said Reuben, pausing.

"Just now you said you were a bad man. As if I didn't know better than that!"

"Ah! you are a knowing young woman."

"Grandmother told me all about you—and your father."

"What do you know about my father?"

"That you and he didn't agree very well, though you were both excellent men."

"It's an excellent world when you thoroughly know it," said Reuben; "but then we never thoroughly know it, I am afraid."

Lucy entered at this juncture with a basin of gruel in her hand.

"How you two have been talking! Didn't the doctor tell you to keep yourself quiet?" said she to Sarah.

"I have so much to say now," she replied.

"What do you mean by the doctor?" asked Reuben.

"She fainted away in the street, and I took her to the nearest doctor's," Lucy explained.

"I am used to fainting—it's weakness caused by growing too fast, they say," said Sarah.

"Yes, I remember: you do faint," said Reuben, with a laugh; but the big dark eyes only regarded him gravely. That was the second joke of his which had fallen flatly that evening.

"Bid your cousin good-night," said Lucy, "and we'll go up stairs."

"And in the morning we must leave early, please," said Sarah.

"In the morning we will arrange that," Reuben replied.

"Thank you. Good-night, Sir."

"You need not 'Sir' me quite so much, cousin," said Reuben; "it's a deferential method of address that makes me blush, and blushing is not good for me. Good-night, Sarah. Good-night, Lucy."

"I shall be down again presently," said Lucy, meaningly.

CHAPTER XXI.

WARNINGS.

REUBEN took this last remark of Lucy's as a hint to remain, and went into the garden to see what had become of John Jennings. He found that gentleman reclining in an angle of one of the most tumble-down summer-houses that had been ever constructed, placidly smoking his long pipe, apart from the turmoil of Hope Lodge.

"I have been looking for you, John," Reuben said, as he took a seat near him.

"How is she now?" asked John.

"She is very weak and low, but a night's rest will do her good."

"I have known twenty nights' rests only make her worse."

"Of whom are you speaking?"

"Lucy."

"Oh!—Lucy."

"If she was only a little bit more patient—if she took things easily and smoothly—what a difference it would make! She has upset half that preparation, Mr. Reuben."

"You should not have kept it in the kitchen," said Reuben, siding with Lucy for once.

"Who would have thought of her lighting a fire at this time of night?—but then that poor girl was ordered gruel, certainly. Will you have some whisky?"

"What! have you brought the bottle out here?"

"No, but I can soon fetch it. So far as I am concerned, I limit myself strictly to one glass after supper—unless I have a friend with me—and yet Lucy says I'm a fuddler."

"Lucy is a trifle hasty, that's all," said Reuben; "but I'll never say a word against that brave woman again—never in all my life, John, if I can help it. She's a sister to be proud of."

"Ah! and she'd make a good wife too," said John, mildly and suggestively.

"That she would."

"A very good wife. I should be glad to see her married to a respectable young man."

"Yes—or an elder of her chapel, or the minister, or somebody that's very good to match. So should I."

"Ahem!—would you indeed?"

John Jennings was quietly surprised. It was one of his idiosyncrasies to consider that Reuben was secretly fond of his sister. This idea was constantly receiving a severe shock, which, however, he recovered from speedily.

"And now, John, to business."

"Business—what business?" asked John.

"How much ready money can you lend me till next Saturday, when the 'screw' from the Trumpet turns up?"

"Ready money, did you say? Bless my heart!" exclaimed John, "I haven't seen any for weeks."

"That's awkward. I'm going to Worcester to-morrow with my cousin."

"There's a great-coat of mine I sha'n't want till the winter, Mr. Reuben—and there's six silver tea-spoons up stairs," he added—"and you are very welcome to the eight-day clock, which they'll always lend five shillings on—and there's—"

Reuben Culwick's hand fell like a thunder-clap on John Jennings's shoulder, and startled the pipe from his mouth to the ground, where it shivered into fifty pieces.

"I thought as much, you secretive old tortoise," cried Reuben: "you're hard up, and keeping it to yourself, and I can only get at the truth in this way. Now how much can I lend you?—for it's no use going on like this any longer."

"Then you're not hard up?"

"I'm as rich as a Jew. I have got an account at the Lambeth Savings-Bank—I am positively rolling in wealth. What shall it be? A hundred thousand pounds till I see you again, or three or four sovereigns till the Saxe-Gotha stumps up?"

John Jennings was silent for a while, although he sat and sniffed at the night air in a curious and excitable way. Presently he put his arm before his eyes with a faint, "Excuse me," and finally said, in a low, nervous treble,

"It's like you, Mr. Reuben. You are always thoughtful of us, when I try hard not to think. Times are slackish, and I'm a baby in them. I know I am, but I can't very well help it. If three pounds will not inconvenience you just now, it will be something like a godsend."

"Here they are."

"I get plenty of credit in my own particular business, of course, for I am a well-known man," said John, after thanking his lodger heartily, and stowing the sovereigns away in his pocket; "but Lucy will pay for every thing for the house. It's a good habit too—I don't blame her in the least."

"No—I wouldn't."

"Mr. Splud's benefit will fetch me straight again; I am the first man he will pay, he says."

"That's kind of him, if he means it."

"Splud's a very well-meaning man," asserted Mr. Jennings.

"And keeps on ordering fire-works—eh, John?"

"He has given me an excellent order for his benefit," said John, cheerfully, "and he tells me that he has sold a heap of tickets."

"Then I would ask for my money before the fire-works are let off."

"Oh! I couldn't do that," said John, "that—that would only lead to words, and hurt the man's feelings. He will pay—depend upon it, Mr. Reuben, that he will pay me every farthing."

The figure of Lucy Jennings emerged from the shadows, and came toward them.

"What have you two men to arrange so confidentially between you, that you get away from the house?" said Lucy, querulously, as she advanced.

"I came here for coolness," said John in reply, and Reuben Culwick did not offer any reason for his change of locality.

"I suppose you had something to say that you did not wish me to hear," said Lucy. "You need not trouble me with excuses, John—I know what they are worth."

"How is Sarah Eastbell now?" asked Reuben, by way of diversion.

"I have left her trying to sleep, but she will fail."

"A good night's rest is necessary before her journey."

"To Worcester, you mean?" said Lucy.

"Yes; I shall take her down to Worcester to-morrow. I think that it is the best and wisest step, and that it will be easy to get her off when the facts are clearly stated."

"You don't see that she is going to be ill?"

"Ill!—did the doctor say so?"

"He said that she was very weak, and that I must be careful of her."

"What is the matter with her?"

"She has undergone great mental excitement, and endured much privation," said Lucy, "and it is an utter break-down."

"I don't see it," cried Reuben.

"We will wait till to-morrow. I thought that I would warn you to-night—as you are so very fond of this cousin—that you can not go to Worcester yet a while," said Lucy.

"'As I am so very fond of this cousin,'" quoted Reuben—"poor second cousin, with only my immense affection to rely upon at the turning-point of her miserable existence."

"She can rely on her God," said Lucy.

"I wouldn't, Lucy—I really wouldn't to-night go on in that kind of way," pleaded her feeble brother.

"She can rely on you too, Lucy, unless your interest in her has died out with your rescue," said Reuben.

"We shall see," said Lucy, evasively.

CHAPTER XXII.

ALL THE NEWS.

MISS JENNINGS was right in her judgment. Sarah Eastbell did not go to Worcester the next day—did not remember her promise to accompany her cousin Reuben—did not know even the man with the big beard who leaned over the bedside and called her by her name.

The crisis had come, and Sarah Eastbell had a battle to fight with brain-fever, or with a strange delirium which was akin to it. When she came back to herself, she lay as powerless as Grandmother Eastbell at St. Oswald's, of whom she first thought, along with the fleeting fancy that she was in one of the wings of the almshouses, and that the old woman was not far away. A fortnight had passed then, and the face of the nurse had almost died out of her memory.

"How—is—grandmother?" she asked, with difficulty, and pausing at each word.

"She is well."

"Will—you—tell—her—that—I'm—better, please?"

"Yes."

Sarah Eastbell remained satisfied with the promise, and was silent for a while. She slept a great deal that day and the next, and ate but little, and it was doubtful whether the complete prostration which followed would not terminate the odd life of Second-cousin Sarah.

The woman who attended upon her, and who she began to recollect was the fire-work-maker's sister, was kinder than she had ever been, and watched her with great gravity of interest as she hovered on the border land of life and death.

Lucy talked to her also with a strange earnestness of those divine truths which are not to be dwelt upon in the pages of a story-book, and Sarah Eastbell listened with reverence.

"You think that I am going to die?" she said once.

Miss Jennings never evaded a fact, but she was more considerate than it was her habit to be, when she replied,

"I would be prepared, at all events."

"I'm not afraid," said Sarah Eastbell. "I have not done any one harm, and this life is not worth stopping in—is it?"

"I don't know," answered Lucy: "life's a mystery, Sarah."

"You don't value it, I think."

"If I could change places with you, I would."

"And yet you have a brother to look after, just as I have my grandmother," said Sarah. "Oh, poor grandmamma! I wonder how you are, and if you think of me at times!"

"You will know all about her soon. Your cousin Reuben returns to-morrow."

"Has he been there?"

"Yes."

"What a good man he is!" exclaimed Sarah. "It isn't like men, I fancy, to think of other people so much as he does."

"He is strange."

"I said that he was good," said Sarah, persistently.

"I hope he is," answered Lucy Jennings.

"Oh, I am sure he is!" cried the invalid, with enthusiasm. "I wish that I could be suddenly very beautiful and very rich."

"It is not a good wish," said Lucy; "but why?"

"I would marry Cousin Reuben."

"You lying there, and talking of marriage!"

"If I died, he would have my money; if I lived, I would try—oh, so hard!—to make him happy."

"You're not fit for him, and never will be," said Lucy, more snappish than she had been hitherto; "and this is very foolish talk."

"What is very foolish talk?" said a deep voice without the door; and both women colored, and the elder one rose from her chair in her surprise. "May I come in and see the invalid?"

"He is back a day before his time," said Lucy. "May he come in?" she said to Sarah.

"Yes, to be sure," answered the sick girl.

Reuben Culwick advanced on tiptoe into the room, and walked to the bedside of his cousin, whose face brightened at the sight of him.

She was very weak, and could not reach her hand toward him, but there was a faint smile of welcome on her wan face. There was a great contrast between the vigorous ruddy health of the man fresh from the country, and this fading, fluttering life before him.

Reuben Culwick regarded the invalid intently behind the smile with which he masked the shock that her weakness gave him. He had been compelled to leave London to report on a stormy election in the country, and he had hardly expected to find her strong and well, though he had been more sanguine of ultimate results than he was at that moment of his return.

"Well, Sarah—better, I hope?" he said, in the cheeriest voice he could assume.

Sarah smiled faintly, and shook her head.

"Oh yes, you are," said Reuben, confidently: "you have got your wits back, although you have been talking foolishly to Lucy. May I inquire the subject of conversation?"

"No, you mayn't," answered Lucy.

"I will tell you to-morrow, if I am worse," said Sarah; "to-day you have news for me."

"To be sure I have. What a blockhead I am!"

"Is it good news?"

"Do you think that I would bring bad news all the way from Worcester?" he said, laughing—"that I wouldn't have left it behind me, or dropped it out of window before reaching Hope Lodge?"

"Go on, please," said Sarah, anxiously.

"I went across country after writing my article for the Trumpet—by-the-way, the Trumpet is getting on in the world, Lucy, and there are signs in the air of an increase of wage for R. C.—and reached Worcester yesterday afternoon."

"And saw grandmother?"

"Who was as lively as a cricket. By George, if she wasn't toddling about the court-yard, and bullying Mother Muggeridge for not putting her kettle on to boil!"

"Who had dressed her, then?"

"Miss Holland, I hear."

"That is another friend I had almost forgotten," said Sarah. "Well?"

"Well—I told her that you were staying at Hope Lodge with me and the Jenningses, for change of air—that you had not been very well, but that I should bring you down to Worcester shortly."

"You should not have said that," said Sarah—"and yet I should like to be taken to Worcester if I die," she added, thoughtfully.

"But you are not going to die," said Reuben,

Hosted by Google

"LUCY WATCHED HER AS SHE HOVERED ON THE BORDER LAND OF LIFE AND DEATH."

quickly; "don't get that into your head, for Heaven's sake!"

"For Heaven's sake it may be as well to think of it a little," said Lucy Jennings, gravely.

Reuben Culwick did not dispute the assertion, but he moved about the room uneasily, as if disposed to do so. Suddenly he stopped.

"Yes, you are right, Lucy," he said. "Sarah is a brave little woman who will not fret herself to death over the worst, and who will get strong if she can."

"What do you call the worst?" asked Lucy.

"I'll tell you some other time—this is not a place for argument," answered Reuben, evasively; "besides, I haven't quite done with my news yet.—Sarah, do you remember that bad sovereign Tom asked you to change at the grocer's for him?"

"Ah, yes!"

"Well, I have been to the grocer's—I have stated the matter with lucidity and eloquence—I have appealed to the grocer's feelings—I have made him shed tears over his own sugar—and he says that rather than prosecute, after my gentlemanly explanation, he'll see the authorities at the— Ahem! how warm it is to-day, Lucy!"

"Mr. Giles does not think that I tried to pass bad money now?" cried Sarah.

"Not a bit of it. And after my statement, Sarah, I went round to the police station, and threatened every body, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the inspector on duty, with libel, if they did not take down their absurd bills about you. I told them that the grocer had discovered his mistake in making the charge—that he withdrew it—that it was even a splendid sovereign, considering of what stuff it was composed—and the inspector made a handsome apology, and asked to shake hands with me."

"I don't see the necessity for this gross exaggeration," said Lucy, severely.

"But I do. Why, Second-cousin Sarah's laughing—almost.—Aren't you?"

"I am very grateful for the trouble that you have taken," said Sarah, "and I feel very happy now."

"Then I'll leave you with those sensations to get strong upon."

Lucy followed him from the room.

"You are in high spirits to-day, Mr. Reuben," she said; "is there any reason for it?"

"Only that I am at home again—that the Penny Trumpet is blowing itself into public favor, and knowing people say that it's my doing—that all's well every where."

"Even there?" asked Lucy, indicating by a gesture the room which she had quitted.

"Yes, I hope so."

"I think that she will die."

"I'll not believe it."

"It is best for her that she should, rather than face the cruel world again."

"The world may change for her—we have helped to change it in our little way already," said Reuben.

"You have gone a strange way to work, at any rate."

"Ah! you don't admire my style, that is all."

"You should keep your flippant style of narrative for the novel that you can't sell."

"Now, confound it, Lucy—"

But Lucy had gone back into the room after that extremely ill-natured remark, without waiting for Reuben Culwick's protest.

Reuben went into his own apartment, and walked up and down with his hands in his pockets, and his hat on the back of his head.

"What an ill-tempered, aggravating, sharp-tongued, good-hearted Christian porcupine that woman is!" he muttered. "For the novel that I can't sell, indeed!—that is the unkindest cut of all. Something must be wrong down stairs, or Sarah has tired her too much, or Tots has been up to her larks while I have been away. Now where's my little fairy who brightens up this fire-work establishment, and never gives a disappointed man a hard word? What have they done with Tots to-day, I wonder?"

He went down stairs, where was John Jennings up to his eyes in powder, and colored fire, and "lengths," the picture of a busy man.

"Well, weren't they glad to see you?" exclaimed John, without leaving off his work.

"Glad to see me—they have been laughing their heads off, especially Lucy. What is all this work?—for Splud?"

"Yes."

"Hasn't his benefit come off, then?"

"Oh yes, with immense success. This is for a repetition fête. The big devices and the fiery pigeon business were very much admired."

"And you got your money?"

"What a man you are, Mr. Reuben, to think about money!" said John, with a cracked little laugh. "I have some of it."

"How much?"

"He paid me seven pounds off the account, and he will settle for the lot presently. And that reminds me that I owe you—"

"We'll talk of that in a day or two," said Reuben, impatiently. "Where's Tots?"

"Tots—why, up stairs."

"I haven't seen her."

"She doesn't go into the back-room, for fear of disturbing your cousin. But she plays in your apartments, and Lucy looks in, and makes sure that she is not up to mischief."

"She is not in my room," said Reuben, turning somewhat pale at the mere possibility of a new trouble approaching him.

"Perhaps she is in mine."

"Go and see," said Reuben, peremptorily.

"Certainly," said John Jennings, "and I'll bring her down with me. Keep an eye on the shop, please; and you'll find some whisky in the cupboard, if you would like a little refreshment after your long journey."

Reuben did not answer. When John Jennings had gone, he, without any regard to the business interests, took a turn round the back garden, and then walked to the front of the house, and stood looking up and down the street with grave intentness. Presently John and his sister came out together, white and scared, and joined him on the pavement.

"She's gone! By Heaven, you have lost her!" he exclaimed.

"It's—it's very strange," said John, "but we can't find her any where."

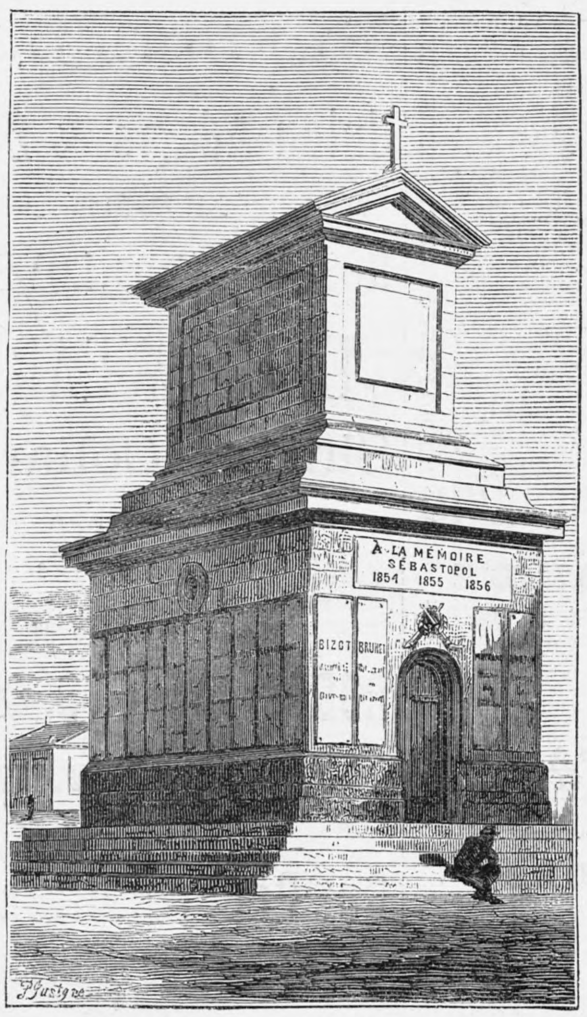
[TO BE CONTINUED.]

EVENING TOILETTE.

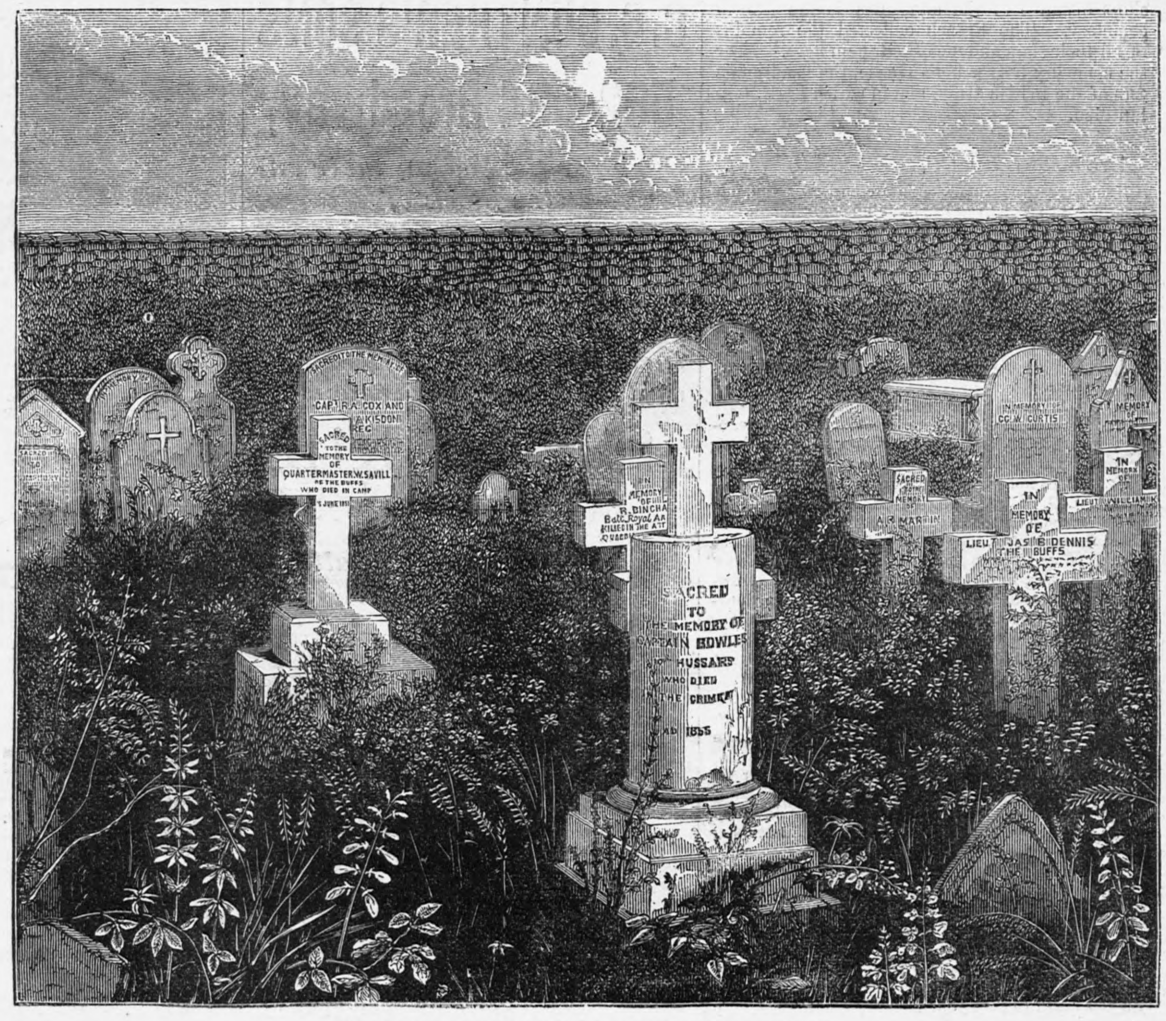
THIS stylish evening toilette, combining pink, white, and yellow, is of pink silk trimmed with bands of white faille embroidered with garlands of tea-roses in the new tufted work. The demi-trained skirt has side pleating in front, with a box-pleated flounce on the back and sides. The pouf over-skirt is shorter behind, and trimmed with an embroidered band. A garland of artificial tea-roses hangs like a sash behind, and a similar one heads the flounce. Low round waist with white silk bretelles and loops. Necklace and bracelets of amber beads. Pink and rose ostrich tips in the hair, and a tea-rose cluster. White kid gloves.

EVENING TOILETTE.

Hosted by Google



THE FRENCH MAUSOLEUM—SEBASTOPOL.



THE ENGLISH BURIAL-GROUND, CATHCART'S HILL.

CRIMEAN SKETCHES.

WHEN the Crimea was annexed to Russia, the Empress Catherine ordered an expedition to survey the Bay of Akhtiar on the southwest coast, where there was a small Tartar village. The expedition having reported favorably of its capabilities, the construction of a military harbor was resolved upon, and barracks, storehouses, a hospital, and a navy-yard were built, the materials used in their construction being the historical stones of the ancient city Khersonesus. In 1784 the Empress ordered the port to be named Sebastopol, or the Sacred City. Under the fostering care of successive emperors, Sebastopol became one of the finest military harbors in Europe, and hence became the chief arena of the gigantic struggle between Russia and the allied powers in 1854–55. At the present time the town contains about eight thousand inhabitants, and beyond its houses begin the ruins of its fortifications and batteries, the trenches of its besiegers, and their exploded mines. The Malakoff Tower, the Great Redan, and Little Redan, were once "familiar as household words" in our mouths, but for the present we will pass them without notice, and cross in a ferry-boat to the north side of the town, where stands the Russian cemetery, the most prominent object in which is a huge gray pyramid (one hundred and five feet high), surmounted by a cross raised to the memory of the troops who fell in defense of the city. The interior of the pyramid is converted into a chapel, where prayers are offered up for the repose of the souls. Our illustration represents a painting of "The Last Judgment" over the entrance. On the terrace in front are some large guns taken from the Turks at Balaklava. The cemeteries and memorials of the allies number about one hundred and thirty in all, and are on the ground which extends from Sebastopol to Balaklava, and from Kamiesch to the Tchernaya. One of the most important of these cemeteries is that at Cathcart's Hill (represented in our sketch). This, from its commanding position, is distinguishable for many miles both by sea and land.

The ancient city of Khersonesus, which was built 700 years before the Christian era, lies about three miles from Sebastopol. Near the modern church of Khersonesus is a small monastery dedicated to St. Vladimir, and within a short distance of the monastery is the French cemetery. The French collected the remains of all their slain and deposited them here. Near the cemetery is Bracker's House, the head-quarters of the British army, and in which Lord Raglan died.

PAINTING OVER THE ENTRANCE TO THE RUSSIAN MONUMENT—SEBASTOPOL.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NECESSITY AND OTHERS.—We are sorry for you, but are unable to assist you in obtaining employment.

S. E. T.—Kid false necks are a wretched mockery, only fit for wax dolls, and we advise you to banish all thoughts of them, and to eschew low-necked dresses if you are not content with the charms bestowed on you by nature. We certainly don't know where you can buy one, and should have conscientious scruples about telling you if we did.

AMELIA WILSON.—You can order the book from any retail bookseller.

KATIE C. V.—The registration of one's wife as lady is in most exceptionable taste. Not so with an invitation to a hop addressed to Mr. —— and lady, which leaves him at liberty to invite some other lady in case his wife does not wish to accompany him.

MRS. A. G. S.—If you have informed your acquaintances that you have a friend visiting you, and invited them to call on her, they ought either to ask for her as well as yourself, or to refrain from calling while she is at your house, as their neglect to do so implies a disinclination to make her acquaintance. When, however, they have not been explicitly notified of her presence, you should introduce her to your callers, taking it for granted that they will like to know your guests.

R. D. P.—A man's house is his castle, and if he insists on spending the evenings in the parlor in his dressing-gown and slippers, there is no law to prevent him but the law of good taste. But, to be logical, he should stand by his principles, and neither apologize for his dress nor retire to put on his coat should visitors come in. Except in case of sickness, we think a dressing-gown as much out of place in a parlor of an evening as a wash-stand would be.

MARIE.—Your fifty-cent stamp is counterfeit.—Use candle-wick for piping cord, and soft foundation muslin for lining bias bands.

ACONITE.—Instead of navy blue alpaca at $1 25 a yard, get navy blue cashmere at the same price, for your winter dress. Sixteen yards will be an abundance. Make with double-breasted tight redingote. As you failed to give your name and address, we can not send your pattern. Do not use very large buttons, as they have already lost favor. Let your skirt just touch the ground, and provide rings and tape for shortening it when in the street. French dresses are not lined, but a cambric lining makes the skirt warmer and more durable.

MRS. LEWIS.—Get white cony fur sacques and turbans for your little girls. White and colored merino stockings, crimson and blue, will be worn by little girls. Use seal or else plucked otter fur to trim a boy's cloak. Make the blue cashmere with a little polonaise. Wave the child's short hair, comb it back from the face, and tie with a ribbon fillet.

GRISWOLD.—A fine black alpaca would look well made by demi-polonaise suit pattern. Put only two or three rows of side pleating upon it, as it is in bad taste to load alpaca with trimming.

MRS. C. R. G.—Any of the dark fur trimmings described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 46, Vol. VI., will be suitable to trim your jacket in mourning—either black marten, fox, seal, or Astrakhan.

PERPLEXITY.—The bottoms of skirts are bound with braid. Use the Demi-polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 43, Vol. VI., for your best black silk.

CARRIE.—Make your black silk with a demi-polonaise. Put side pleatings on the skirt and jet galloon with fringe on the demi-polonaise.

☞ THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, of Boston, is a thoroughly wide-awake paper, having among its contributors such writers as Prof. De Mille, Dr. I. I. Hayes, Edward Eggleston, Louisa M. Alcott, Sophie May, Mrs. Rebecca Harding Davis, and Mrs. Louisa Chandler Moulton. No writers more attractive in the country, and no publication for young people more enterprising and useful.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR Falling, Loss, and Untimely Gray Hair consult Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N.Y.

DR. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, cures all Scalp Diseases.

DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York, cures unnatural redness of the Nose or Face.

BEARDSLEY'S PATENT SEWING-MACHINE
NEEDLE-THREADER.
Best thing out for use. Agents wanted, men and women. Quick sales, big profits. Order Circular, or mail 50c. for sample. IXL NEEDLE WORKS, Ansonia, Conn.

SHOPPING
Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

PARIS NOVELTIES ☞ JUST RECEIVED.
The Elegant "PANSY" Corset, the GRACEFUL Corset, NEW BUSTLES, Embroidered Underwear, Undressed Kid Gloves, Fine Fans, and Gift Goods.
J. C. DEVIN,
Under Sturtevant House, 1192 Broadway.

LADIES! CONSTITUTION WATER IS GOOD FOR ALL FEMALE COMPLAINTS; gives immediate relief. Dose 40 drops. Send for circular. MORGAN & ALLEN, Agents, 59 John Street.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS
502-504 Broadway,
Offer for the Season their entire Stock of
Ladies' Furs,
including a Very Extensive and Elegant Assortment of
Seal-Skin Furs,
in all Styles and Qualities, at greatly
Reduced Prices.
502-504 Broadway.

BARRY'S
TRICOPHEROUS
Prevents the Hair from falling off, eradicates scurf, dandruff, &c., keeps it in the most beautiful condition, and is warranted to cause new Hair to GROW ON BALD PLACES.
Sold by all Druggists.

A. SELIG,
(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),
No. 813 Broadway, New York,
Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.
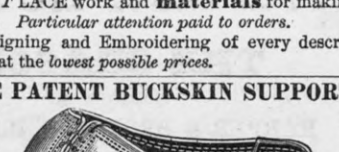
Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN SUPPORTER
FOR LADIES And Gentlemen



☞ HAS NO WHALEBONES OR STEEL RIBS; no ELASTIC OR RUBBER BANDS; is easily adjusted, and fits the form perfectly. Send for circular. D. C. HALL & CO., No. 44 West Broadway, N. Y., Sole Agents for Smith's Perforated Buckskin Under-garments, and Sibley's Patent Dress Shields.

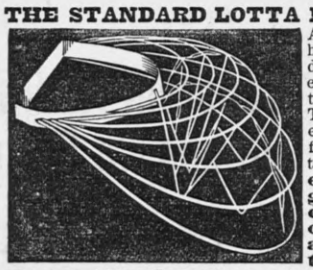
DRESS ELEVATOR.
Instantly changing Skirt from Train to Walking, and Walking to Train.
Price 35c. each. Three free by mail for $1.
Free by mail, 40c. each. 1 doz. free by mail for $3, with full directions. Call or send to W. H. JOHNSON, 267 Broadway, N. Y. AGENTS WANTED.

SCHOOLDAY MAGAZINE.
ONLY $1.00 A YEAR
Eighteenth year. The Cheapest and best Young Folks' Magazine published. A fine $2 Engraving FREE to every subscriber. GOOD PAY to Agents. Send a three-cent stamp for Specimen and "tools" to work with. Address the Publishers,
J. W. DAUGHADAY & CO.,
436 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

ALUMINOUS AND ORNAMENTAL
BUILDING PAPER
Paper Carpeting and Oil Cloth.
Send for Samples and Price-List.
W. H. H. ROGERS & CO., 2 & 3 College Place, N. Y. F. N. DAVIS & CO., Beloit, Wis.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE.
ASK YOUR STOREKEEPER FOR IT.



A diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee & Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.

BEAUTIFY THE SKIN
BY USING LAIRD'S
"Bloom of Youth."

This harmless & delightful toilet preparation will remove all discolorations and blemishes from the skin, leaving it SOFT, CLEAR, SMOOTH, and BEAUTIFUL.
SOLD AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

THREE PAIR
Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, and Dress-Trimmings. A splendid Black Dress Silk, $1 25 yard. Heavy Black Silk Velvet, only $2 yard—worth double. Samples sent free.
FINE FURS
of every description at less than manufacturers' prices. ☞ Send for Price-List. All goods selected therefrom sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

VICK'S FLORAL GUIDE FOR 1874.
☞ 200 Pages, 500 Engravings, and Colored Plate.
Published Quarterly, at 25 cents a year. First No. for 1874 just issued. A German edition at same price. Address JAMES VICK, Rochester, N.Y.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

The New Florence
Is the only Sewing-Machine that feeds the work backward and forward, or to the right and left, as the purchaser may prefer. It has been greatly IMPROVED & SIMPLIFIED, and is far better than any other machine now in the market. ☞ FLORENCE SEWING-MACHINE COMPANY, Florence, Mass.

THE SABBATH
THE LATEST, THE GREATEST, AND THE BEST TUNE BOOK FOR Church Choirs of all Denominations.
Price, $1.50.
Per dozen Copies, $18 50.
One Sample Copy, by Mail, $1.25.
LEE & WALKER, 922 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

200 PIANOS AND ORGANS,
New and Second-hand, of First-class Makers, will be sold at Lower Prices for cash, or on Installments, or for rent, in City or Country, during this Financial Crisis, by HORACE WATERS & SON, 481 Broadway, than ever before offered in New York. Agents wanted for the sale of Waters' Celebrated Pianos, Concerto and Orchestral Organs. Illustrated Catalogues Mailed. Great Inducements to the Trade.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS and a book of forty pages mailed for FIFTY CENTS, by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

LADIES! JUST THE PAPER FOR YOU!!!
Send stamp for Specimen Copy ☞ Free.

The Ladies' Floral Cabinet. A beautiful NEW Home Paper, devoted to Flowers, Window Gardening, and Parlor Decorations. Exquisitely illustrated. Ladies will be delighted with it. Delightful home pictures of society and Amusements, with useful hints on housekeeping and Elegancies.
Price $1 50 per year, including 3 Choice Chromos.
" $1 25 " " " " 1 " "
Price 25 cents on trial three months.
GET UP A CLUB. AGENTS WANTED. Premium List F.ee.
Window Gardening. A New Book, superbly illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Bulbs, and Flowers for in-doors, with handsome illustrations of Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Sent, postpaid, by mail. Book Stores have it.
The Ladies' Cabinet Initial Note-Paper. Rose or Violet Tinted; your own initial. Handsome present. Highly perfumed. Attractive Chromo on each Box. Price 50c. a Box. 100 PAPERS AT CLUB RATES. Send Stamp for List Free. Address
"LADIES' FLORAL CABINET,"
5 Beekman Street, Room 5, New York.

REDUCED.
Union Adams & Co.
ARE OFFERING AT VERY LOW PRICES
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
UNDERWEAR,
Shirts & Collars,
HANDKERCHIEFS,
SUSPENDERS,
ROBES, JACKETS, &c.
637 BROADWAY.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.
The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.
Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.
Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

HOLIDAY GOODS
Shaw & Eaton S
Are offering THE LATEST NOVELTIES in LACE FICHUS, CAPES, COLLARETTES, SCARFS, TIES, &c., at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
1105 BROADWAY, bet. 24th & 25th Sts., N. Y.

SAMPLES FREE!!—The Saturday Evening Post, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, gives a beautiful Chromo or large Steel Engraving to every yearly subscriber! Samples free!

SOMETHING NEW.—A Toy sent free for 15c. Address TOY, 435 N. 10th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00: postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

EHRICH'S.

FURS! FURS! FURS! FURS!

Best and Cheapest in the Country.

Our Furs are exclusively of our own manufacture, and have all been made up with special attention to fineness of Fur and excellence of workmanship. Yet our saving of manufacturers' profits has been so large as to explain our startling prices.

We cordially invite ladies to examine our Furs, and will always esteem it a pleasure to show them, whether they are ready to purchase or not.

We allow no misrepresentations. Every article warranted as represented.

Ladies' Furs.

Real Mink Sets, all very fine quality, at $33, $38, $40, $45, $48, and upward.

Real Seal Sets, very beautiful, at $28, $30, $35, and upward.

Real Lynx Sets, very fashionable, at $22, $25, $28.

Russian Fox Sets at $20, worth $35.

Special bargains in real Silver Fox, real Chinchilla, real Ermine, and real Grebe Sets.

Black Polar Lynx Sets, beautiful muff and beautiful boa, at $5 95.

Elegant real Alaska Sable Sets at $10 45, $12, $15, $18. We call special attention to these sets.

Real Black Astrakhan Sets, good quality, at $5 35.

Black Marten Sets, very fine, at $8 50, $9, $10.

English Seal Sets, lined and finished equal to real seal, at $7, $8; sold generally at $15.

Brown French Mink Sets, muff and boa, very best quality, at $5 75, $6 75.

White French Ermine Sets, muff and boa, at $2 68, $4, $6.

EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS

In real Seal Sacques, real Nutria Sacques, real Astrakhan, and Iceland Lamb Sacques.

Children's Furs.

The variety of our Misses' and Children's Furs is so very extensive that to enumerate them would be next to impossible.

Children's beautiful Coney Sets, muff and boa, at $1 15.

Misses' white Fox Sets, very fine, at $2.

Misses' real Siberian Squirrel Sets, at $4 50, worth $5 50.

White Coney Caps, best Fur, nicely lined, with head, wing, and eartabs, at 48c.; sold every where at $1.

Children's white Coney Sacques, very best Fur, lined with quilted silk and pocket, at $4 89, for children from 2 to 4 years. Larger sizes proportionately cheap.

Fur Trimmings in Immense Variety.

These goods have all been reduced 40 per cent. from former prices.

TOYS.

☞ We shall send these Toys to the country, but only when prepaid. Goods not satisfactory can be returned, when the ☞ money will be immediately refunded.

Wishing to reduce the immense stock of Toys which we have imported from Europe, and being unwilling to interfere with other departments, we shall, on Monday, open our whole stock of Elegant Toys and Holiday Goods on the third floor, offering them to the public without reserve. We shall offer these toys at less than they can be bought at wholesale. We very pressingly urge upon superintendents of Sunday-schools, asylums, &c., especially those who gave us their kind patronage in 1872, to make their selections as soon as possible. We will cheerfully pack and hold the goods for them until wanted. All who wish to see the most novel and most interesting productions in the realm of Santa Claus, and all who wish to buy the cheapest toys in the United States are cordially invited to pay a visit to our

NEW TOY DEPARTMENT.

☞ EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS in Real Laces, Black Silks, Alpacas, Shawls, Cloaks, Dress Trimmings, &c., &c.

We have just received the first two Prizes at the American Institute Fair for the superior quality of our Ladies' and Infants' Wear and Millinery Goods, and, therefore, feel warranted in calling the attention of Ladies to our superb assortment of

TRIMMED AND UNTRIMMED

HATS, FEATHERS, FLOWERS, RIBBONS, and FULL TROUSSEAUX for LADIES, MISSES, AND INFANTS.

We make a specialty of Fine French Underwear.

Send for Fall Catalogue to

EHRICH'S,

287 & 289 8th AVE., Near 24th ST., New York.

GREAT REDUCTIONS

In BLACK YAK LACES, BLACK YAK, with Jet; SPANISH, with Jet; FRENCH-MADE WORSTED FRINGE, GIMP, Same Shade for Headings.

☞ Orders by Mail promptly filled.

Miller & Grant,

No. 879 Broadway.

PLEASANT and profitable employment for Women can be had by taking subscriptions for "WHAT WOMAN SHOULD KNOW." A complete book on the physiology, health, and life of women. Has sold tremendously, and, as it is the only work of the kind ever written by a woman, is highly prized. Some lady agents have sold over 500 copies already. Notwithstanding the times, this book will sell largely. Sample sheets and terms sent free, by J. M. STODDART & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

VISITING Cards 50cts. A Pack of 30 Post paid by E. C. Anderson. 165 Market St NEWARK, New Jersey samples sent

FRENCH EMBROIDERIES AND STAMPING.—V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N. Y. Lingerie, Ladies' and Babies' Trousseau. Direct importation. Finest stock on hand. Orders filled with care. Specialty of Monograms. MACHINES and Perforated PATTERNS.

OUR REDUCTIONS SUCCESSFUL!!!

☞ Constant Additions of New and Desirable Goods, at Prices to Suit the Times!

LORD & TAYLOR,

BROADWAY AND TWENTIETH ST.;
GRAND STREET AND CHRYSTIE, New York.

A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

CASHMERE BOUQUET

A DELICATE SOAP FOR THE TOILET.

CASHMERE BOUQUET

MADE BY COLGATE & COMPANY, NEW YORK.

KNABE

Grand, Square, & Upright Pianos,
New York House, No. 112 5th Ave.
WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

POPULAR PRICES.

LADIES', CHILDREN'S, & INFANTS' OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT.

MISSES' CLOTH SACQUES.
POPLIN, SERGE, AND SAILOR SUITS.
FLANNEL, CASHMERE, and SILK WRAPPERS.
INFANTS' WALKING COATS and CLOAKS.
COMPLETE WARDROBES FOR INFANTS.
LADIES' UNDERGARMENTS, in great variety, ready made and to order.
FRENCH AND GERMAN CORSETS, &c.

PARIS & CITY MADE GARMENTS,
ALL GREATLY REDUCED, to close the season.

INDIA SHAWLS.
Are offering GREAT INDUCEMENTS in
STRIPED INDIA LONG SHAWLS, from $20 and upward.
FILLED CENTRE SQUARE SHAWLS, $35 and upward.
DOMESTIC AND SCOTCH WOOL LONG AND SQUARE SHAWLS, SQUARE, LONG BROCHE PAISLEY SHAWLS,
LONG and SQUARE FRENCH CAMEL'S-HAIR STRIPED and FILLED SHAWLS,
ALL GREATLY REDUCED IN PRICE.

FUR DEPARTMENT.
SEAL SACQUES, MUFF, BOA, and CAP to match.
" " " " trimmed with Otter.
LADIES' and GENTS' SEAL CAPS, GLOVES, AND COLLARS.
SABLE, MINK, CHINCHILLA, ERMINE, BLACK MARTEN, and other sets.
FUR TRIMMINGS.
FUR ROBES.
LADIES' FUR-LINED CARRIAGE CLOAKS, &c.

BLANKETS, FLANNELS, UNDERWEAR, and HOSIERY,
In great variety and at Very Low Prices.

BROADWAY, cor. Nineteenth Street.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. Printed Directions accompany each Pattern. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. VI.

	No.
DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT	7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)	" 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT	" 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT	" 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT	" 39
DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, with Basque Back and Square Front	" 43
TIGHT-FITTING DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE, with French Round Skirt	" 45
SINGLE-BREASTED BASQUINE, with Short Pouf Walking Skirt	" 47
DOUBLE-BREASTED PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron Front and Square Back Over-skirt and Long Walking Skirt	" 47
DOLMAN DEMI-TRAINED SUIT	" 48
WATER-PROOF CLOAK, with Cape and Sleeves	" 50
TIGHT-FITTING SINGLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE HOUSE DRESS	" 50

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.
SARA COLERIDGE'S MEMOIR AND LETTERS. Memoir and Letters of Sara Coleridge. Edited by her Daughter. With Two Portraits on Steel. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

II.
PLUMER'S PASTORAL THEOLOGY. Hints and Helps in Pastoral Theology. By WILLIAM S. PLUMER, D.D., LL.D. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

III.
HERVEY'S CHRISTIAN RHETORIC. A System of Christian Rhetoric, for the Use of Preachers and Other Speakers. By GEORGE WINFRED HERVEY, M.A., Author of "Rhetoric of Conversation," Principles of Courtesy," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

IV.
PIKE'S SUB-TROPICAL RAMBLES. Sub-Tropical Rambles in the Land of the Aphanapteryx. By NICOLAS PIKE, U. S. Consul, Port Louis, Mauritius. Profusely Illustrated from the Author's own Sketches; containing also Maps and valuable Meteorological Charts. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

THE NEW NOVELS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.
HER FACE WAS HER FORTUNE. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "For Her Sake," "Carry's Confession," "No Man's Friend," "Poor Humanity," "Little Kate Kirby," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

2.
HARPER'S LIBRARY EDITION OF WILKIE COLLINS'S NOVELS. Now ready:
THE NEW MAGDALEN.—THE WOMAN IN WHITE.—POOR MISS FINCH.—MAN AND WIFE. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 each. Other volumes will be issued shortly.

3.
THE TWO WIDOWS. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "Called to Account," "Played Out," "A Passion in Tatters," "The Dower House," "Maud Mohan," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N. Y.

Every baby must have it. Is THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 532 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

CURL YOUR HAIR.—A new Scientific Discovery. It can be done in 5 minutes. Particulars free. Address SOUTHWESTERN AGENCY, Carthage, Mo.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LINNGTON, Chicago.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$375 A MONTH to Male or Female Agents. NOVELTY COMPANY, Biddeford, Me.

$20 PER DAY. 1000 Agents wanted. Particulars free. A. H. BLAIR & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

"The Giant of the Monthlies."

Methodist Quarterly Review.

COMMENCEMENT OF A NEW VOLUME, WITH UNPARALLELED ATTRACTIONS.

CIRCULATION OVER 135,000.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR DECEMBER, 1873.

CONTENTS:

THE WATER WAYS OF NEW YORK. With Sixteen Illustrations.
GREEK NUN.—A.D. 450.
AROUND LAKE LEMAN. By RALPH KEELER. With Nineteen Illustrations.
THE ORGAN-GRINDER. (Illustrated.)
NORTHERN CALIFORNIA.—II. MENDOCINO AND CLEAR LAKE. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. With Eight Illustrations.
THE LIVING LINK. By THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB," "THE AMERICAN BARON," ETC. CHAPTER VI. Walled in.—VII. A Parley with the Jailers.—VIII. Miss Plympton Baffled.—IX. Sir Lionel Dudleigh.—X. Leon.—XI. Lucy. With Three Illustrations.
THE PARTING SOUL.
LIEBER AND NIEBUHR.
FALSE.
A GOLDEN WEDDING. With Ten Illustrations.
SOUTH-COAST SAUNTERINGS IN ENGLAND.—(Saunter IX.) With Eight Illustrations.
POETRY AND PHILOSOPHY OF INDIAN SUMMER. With Map.
DELGRADO.
THE MIRACULOUS PICTURE.
A CHAPTER OF GOSSIP.
A LEGEND OF CRAWFORD NOTCH.
PANIC IN WALL STREET.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.
EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.
EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.

During nearly a quarter of a century HARPER'S MAGAZINE has stood confessedly unrivaled and beyond the reach of rivalry. In the comprehensiveness of its scope, as in the effectiveness of its method, it had no precedent; and in these it could be rivaled only by being excelled. It was the first, as it has remained, the only Popular Magazine, in the fullest sense of that term, ever established.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has steadily pursued the method which at the outset secured its unprecedented success; and its success has ever been its opportunity—enabling its publishers to secure, at whatever cost, the productions of the most brilliant Historians, Novelists, and Essayists in America and Europe; to maintain the highest standard of literary excellence; to enrich its pages with accounts, from the greatest living scientists, of new and important discoveries; and to secure the best illustrations and the most perfect typographical execution made possible by the advancement of the Fine and the Mechanic Arts.

Among the permanent features which have given to HARPER'S MAGAZINE its present commanding and unassailable position may be mentioned the following:

I. Splendidly Illustrated Articles of Travel, embracing every part of the known world and including every important exploration of the unknown.

II. Illustrated Papers, containing the pith and profuse pictorial embellishment of notable new works, or collections of works, belonging to the department of Travels, Science, or History.

III. The publication, serially, of the most important literary productions of the time, during their progress and previous to their publication in book form. These comprise not only serial stories from such writers as WILKIE COLLINS, CHARLES READE, Professor DE MILLE, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Miss THACKERAY, and Miss MULOCK, but also serials of an entirely different character, such as EMILIO CASTELAR'S "Republican Movement in Europe," MONCURE D. CONWAY'S "South-Coast Saunterings in England," PORTE CRAYON'S "Mountains," CHARLES NORDHOFF'S brilliant papers on the Pacific Coast, and the "Recollections of an Old Stager."

IV. The Editor's EASY CHAIR, contributed by the most graceful of living essayists, and consisting of genial discussions upon æsthetic and social topics.

V. Regular editorial Monthly Summaries of Scientific Progress, Contemporary Literature, and Current History.

VI. The Editor's DRAWER—the most entertaining Miscellany published, full of piquant details of Gossip and Anecdote. This department has become one of the "popular institutions" of the country.

Unsurpassed in these permanent features, HARPER'S MAGAZINE is not less felicitous in those ever-varying attractions which give to each Number an individuality of its own and make it what its title claims, a "NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE"—as fresh and novel as if it were the first of the series. Apart from its serials, HARPER'S MAGAZINE offers more entirely new matter to its readers each month than would equal the full contents of a single number of any of its contemporaries.

With the present Number is commenced the Forty-Eighth Volume, which in interest and attractiveness will surpass its predecessors. Beyond this the publishers make no promises. In the future, as in the past, the success of the Magazine will be achieved, not through any short-lived sensation, literary, political, or theological, but through constant efforts to meet the wants and taste of the reading public.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

ONE COPY OF EITHER FOR ONE YEAR, $4 00, POSTAGE PREPAID.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00: postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

THE Professor of Natural Philosophy in a certain college recently gave the class a problem to think of during the night, and answer the next day. The question was this: "If a hole were bored through the centre of the earth, from side to side, and a ball dropped into it, what motions would the ball pass through, and where would it come to a state of rest?" The next morning a student was called up to solve the problem. "What answer have you to give to the question?" asked the professor. "Well, really," replied the student, "I have not thought of the main question, but of a preliminary one. How are you going to get that hole bored through?"

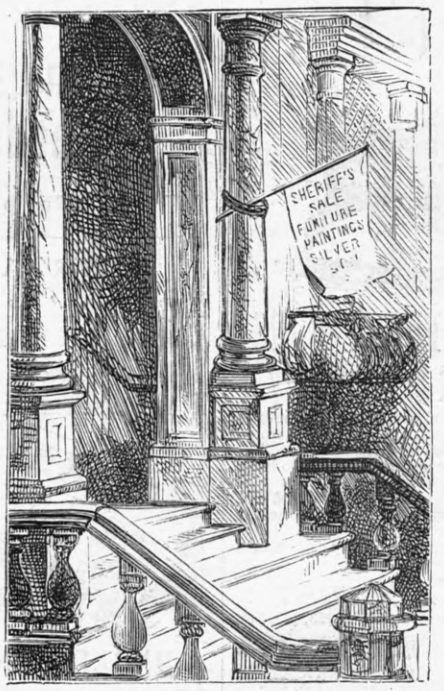
THE END OF THE WORLD.—To make money.

A reverend gentleman, during a sojourn among the hills of New Hampshire, stopping at the door of a cottage, inquired of the occupant if there were any Episcopalians in the neighborhood. "I don't exactly know," replied the dame, rubbing her head with a knitting-needle, "but I believe John shot one in the garden last week, but he thought it was a chipmunk."

GOSSIP!

YOUNG DE BOOTS CELEBRATED HIS GOLDEN WEDDING RECENTLY.

AT MISS BELLA BRIGGS'S BAWL EVERY BODY ATTENDED.



BULLION THREW OPEN HIS MAGNIFICENT HOUSE TO THE PUBLIC LAST WEEK. CROWDS WERE PRESENT.

A little girl who was visiting the family of a neighbor heard them speak of her father as a widower, and on her return home, said, "Pa, are you a widower?" "Yes, my child. Don't you know that your mother is dead?" "Why, yes, I know that mother is dead; but then you always told me you were a New Yorker."

ORGAN GRINDERS.—Says a nervous man: "Who ever heard of one of them dying in a small-pox hospital, or of meningitis, or catching typhoid fever, or poll-evil, or king's-evil, or any other evil that attacks decent folks? Who ever heard of one of them being lost at sea, or smashed up by a railway collision, or falling from a scaffold, or getting drowned while on a fishing excursion, or being killed by an explosion of kerosene or glycerine, or shooting three fingers off with a rifle, or being kicked to death by a musket? All these accidents are constantly occurring, and killing somebody, but no organ grinder is of the number. At least I am sorry to say I never heard of any."

COMPARATIVELY WELL OFF.—You hear people saying, "I've half a mind." Lucky folks to possess even so much as this! Many of us seem to have none at all.

THE BACHELOR'S QUESTION.

"Shall I marry No. 1 and hire No. 2 to take care of her, or shall I marry No. 2 and have her take care of me?"

SOME OF THE THINGS WHICH WILL HAVE TO COME DOWN.

The man whose hair turned white in a single night is surpassed by the Boston girl who lost hers completely in one dance.

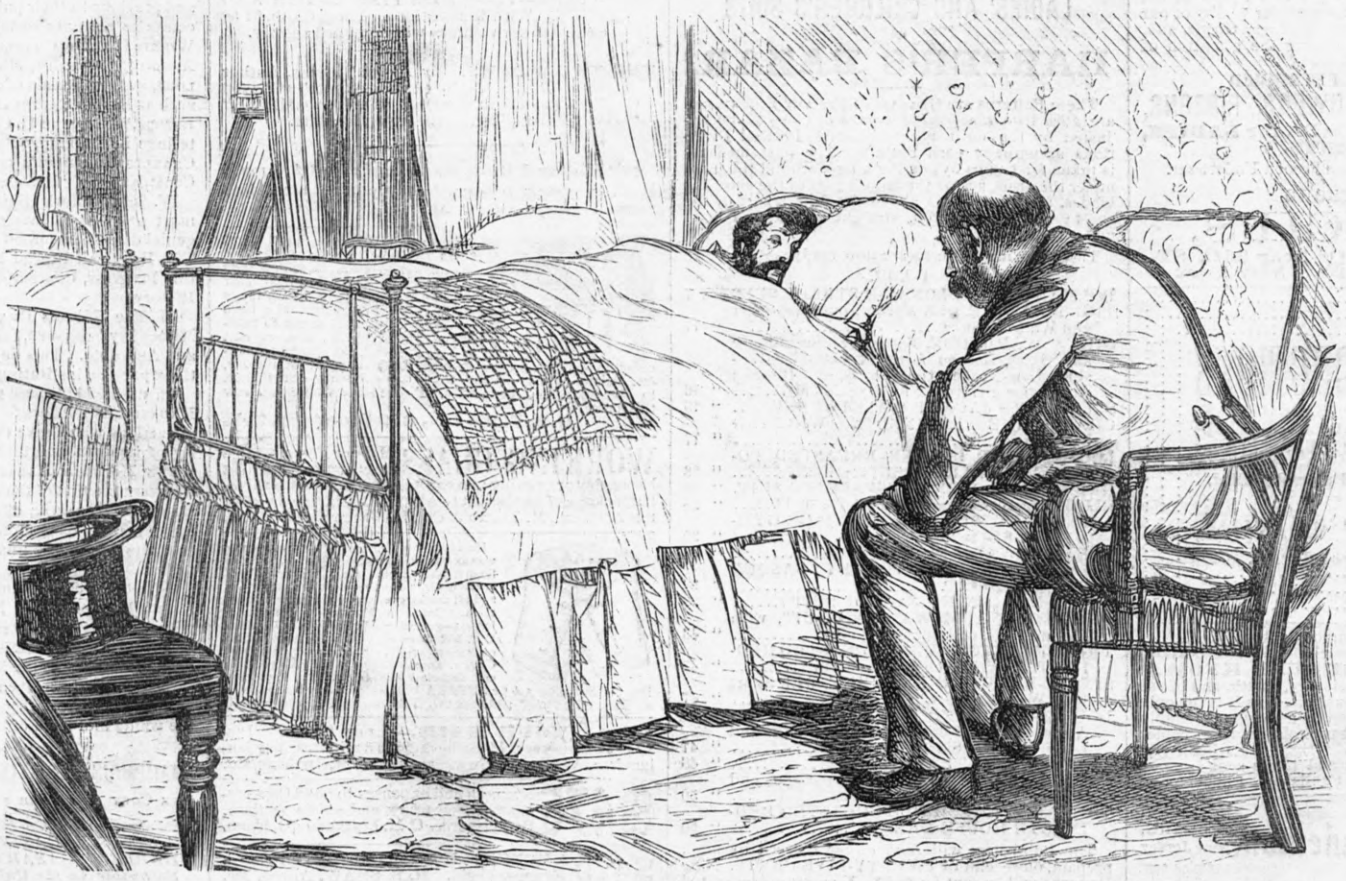
A tailor, while at Long Branch for his holiday, one morning, on emerging from the water, into which he had taken a "header," found himself close to a customer who had long been in his debt. Seizing the opportunity, "I say, Sir," he cried, "when are you going to settle my little account?" "Oh, you shall have it at once," was the ready reply, "if you have got my bill with you."

TRUE ENJOYMENT.

WISE BOY. "Oh, you're a girl, you are, and only like going to a party just to dance. I don't care about that a bit; and I shouldn't go at all if I wasn't sure to get a lot of things to eat that 'll make me ill, and then the doctor will come, and I'll have another holiday."

We have many beautiful meteors these autumn nights. One evening a tender swain said to his "sweetness," "Some of these falling stars seem to leave behind them a bright path, as if they were celestial messengers flying earthward, the dust of heaven falling from their feet, and making a track of light behind." To which the maid replied, "They allers makes me think about the circus man that swallowed fire."

A friend of humanity, in view of the rage for political speech-making, we are informed by a medical authority, wishes to ascertain a secret and expeditious method of communicating lock-jaw.



DESPERATE!

MEDICAL MAN (gingerly). "I think—perhaps—you might—drop a Line, and have your Wife come down."
PATIENT. "Oh, Doctor, you're always for such Extreme Measures!"

A young woman of a very prudish turn was hurt in a railway accident and taken to the hospital, when the doctor asked her what was the matter with her. One of her limbs, she said, was injured. "Well," he returned, "but which limb?" "Oh, I can't tell you, doctor, but it's one of my limbs." "Oh, nonsense!" cried the doctor, out of all patience; "which is it—the limb you thread a needle with?" "No, Sir," she answered, with a blush; "the limb I wear a garter on."

A missionary among the freedmen in Tennessee, after relating to some little colored children the story of Ananias and Sapphira, asked them why God does not strike every body dead that tells a lie, when one of the least in the room quickly answered, "Because there wouldn't be any body left."

"Weight for the wagon," sang the fat lady.

"A strong prejudice," writes a lady, "exists on the part of the natives of India against European education and Christianity. A few instances occur of conversion in the true sense of the term; but I am sorry to say too many leave their own castes for what they can get by the change. I was once hiring a servant, and asked him, 'What caste are you?' 'Oh,' said he, with a broad grin, 'I am mistress's caste; I can eat and drink any thing.'"

CERTAIN CURE FOR CORPULENCE.—Eat and drink as much as ever you possibly can of all sorts of things without any restriction whatsoever, except only that they are perfectly insipid, or else unsavory.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 51.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

"BY THE ADOPTION OF GOD."

SCROGGS and Moggs got this day jointly a great surprise.

Scroggs and Moggs were neighbors—as the kennel neighbors the grand house. Scroggs's life was transacted in four stories of stone; Moggs's in two of wood. Scroggs's safe was built into a wall of his dining-room, and people whispered about its contents under their breath. Moggs, wife, and child lived on a salary of forty dollars a month, and in holiday times were actually all astir with excitement, secrets, and surprises, and intentions about gifts. (The miserable creatures, whose whole year's income could not have purchased Scroggs's watch, we will say!)

Scroggs was in no excitement as he came down the street, except that he had just "given a piece of his mind" to a neighbor whom he met loaded with holiday bundles, and found it satisfactory.

"No, Sir," he said. "I do not believe in holidays. I found myself on Scrooge. I consider that when Dickens drew that man, he had stumbled on a truly strong and sensible character, and, like many another man, did not understand his own creation. All the talk and sentiment about charity and the season is wash; and the experience of these latter days is proving it such. The bread that you put into one set of mouths you take out of another. The true way is to let things alone. Then those who are fit to live will live, and those who are not will do the best possible thing for them, and die."

"But, Mr. Scroggs"—neighbor much shocked—"don't you believe that holidays mean any thing?"

"Mean any thing!" with a sardonic grin. "Certainly: they mean presents to my wife, children, and servants, that I must give to keep the peace. That is what they mean for every body. If there was any one whose position entitled me to demand it, I would remind him of the existence of the holidays, and he would understand me at once, as another case of what you can get. My dear Sir, what is the use of mincing matters? What you can get rules the world. In one shape or another, what you can get rules the world."

"Oh!" said the man of bundles; and then, after an uncomfortable pause, "Good-morning." He had spied a turning, and it would take him half a mile out of his way; but he made for it with an evident air of relief.

Scroggs looked after him and chuckled. "I gave him a dose," he remarked, approvingly, to himself; and then the chuckle ceased rather suddenly. He was conscious of such an odd sensation all over him—a giving out—a faintness. He clutched at a post—missed it; his knees bent; he fell in a heap just by Moggs's door.

His next consciousness was of a bed on which he was lying, in a room, rag-carpeted, and warmed by a cooking-stove—Moggs's room. But such a jolly fire! And a neat woman was laying slices of ham in a long-handled frying-pan. Some women have an air of home in their very collars and the set of their skirts. This was one of them, and Moggs's wife. A man was nailing some green boughs over a door: that was Moggs. A boy held the nails and watched proceedings, head on one side, and mightily interested: that was their child. Mrs. Moggs was interested also, from her post by the stove.

"It is like the woods," she said, "and seems to make out that every thing is not all bought and sold at the corner shop. I like it."

Moggs put in another nail with the air of a man far away in thought, and said, almost as if to himself,

"Maggie, have you spent that five dollars yet?"

His wife laughed.

"I waited for you, Richard. There is the dinner to be decided about. Turkey sounds like holidays, but beef—tastes—and then—"

"Well—then?" repeated Moggs. The look on his face was very grave, quite different from the smile that his wife turned toward him.

"Well, I think," pursued Mrs. Moggs, intent on the ham, and unobservant of her husband, "there is nothing quite so aggravating as a five-dollar note—sometimes. We are tight-shoe people, and I suppose we are always to hobble through life pinched and smiling; and I am willing, when we have so much happiness thrown in besides. Only, once in a while, as now, we all want thick shoes and warm under-clothing. And there is old Miss Felton—think of her sitting all alone, without chick or child, over bread and tea at this season. I do so want to ask her to dinner. I suppose it is natural, too, to want to make Harry a present—what child goes without? Now how is one to do all that on a five-dollar note? I feel sometimes as if I could tear or pull the miserable bill, and make it ten times five at the least."

"Maggie, have you thought—" Moggs jerked his thumb here toward the bed.

"Thought—about that man?"

Mrs. Moggs was smiling no longer.

"You heard the doctor. The man has paralysis. He is incapable even of a gesture. No one knows him. He has no pocket-book and no cards. The doctor has promised to ascertain something if possible; but meanwhile we—"

"Well?" and there was a look far from pleasant in Mrs. Moggs's eyes as she looked up inquiringly.

"He has fallen at our door," pursued Moggs. "We are his brother and sister now by the adoption of God. And the medicines and beef tea and wine that the doctor orders—"

"We are to buy them? I say, No!" interrupted Mrs. Moggs, angrily. "If no one knows him, send him to the poor-house till he is claimed."

"The doctor said that removal would be death; you heard him."

"Well, he has lived his life. He will only be useless and helpless now: a burden on others. Maybe the best thing he can do is to die."

"Do unto others as ye would—"

"That means," she cried, passionately, "give up our dinner on which we have counted for months. Disappoint Harry, who has talked of his Christmas for months. Make our holidays pinched and bleak and bare, like the rest of our lives, when every one else is rejoicing. And what would Christmas be like then?"

"Ay! what would it be? A Christmas without a Christ. The day kept, and its Lord despised in the person of this stranger," returned Moggs, gently.

There was a little silence.—Then Mrs. Moggs got up and kissed her husband. "Richard, you are an angel in a shabby coat. But why should he have fallen at our door? The Lubbecks at the corner there are rich. Now we have pinched ourselves for weeks, and— Do as you like, but it is so."

A sob stopped her.

Then the man lying dumb on the bed agonized to shout his name, and the whereabouts of his purse, but in vain.

Moggs took her face between his two hands, and looked down at her tenderly.

"It is hard," he said.—"There are crosses that a man can't explain, unless—I have come to believe there are two sides to them—we look at them in too selfish a way. We are not suffering only to learn something ourselves, but to help others. I don't see how, but I believe it is so now."

"I believe it too; and I believe in something besides 'what you can get.' You have saved a soul."

Scroggs thought he said that—aloud, and by a mighty final effort; and there he was—awake, and at home. It was a dream.

But a dream that left an impression. That day arrived at Moggs's door such a dinner, in two hampers; a huge box of toys, a barrel of apples, a load of coal, a well-stuffed pocket-book done up in a square parcel, a suit for Moggs. It seemed to storm parcels on the little door. The neighborhood was aroused. The Moggs family were wild with excitement.—There was no clew to the sender. One inscription on all the parcels alike—"From a brother by the adoption of God." All quite mysterious and in the most delightful fairy-land fashion.

Fig. 1.—VIGOGNE DRESS.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-10.

Fig. 2.—VIGOGNE DRESS.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-10.

IMPROVED FLOUR PASTE.

PASTE which will keep unchanged in warm or damp weather may be made in the following manner: Put a tea-spoonful of powdered alum in two quarts of water, and let it boil. Mix a pint of flour smoothly into a pint of cold water, and stir it into the boiling alum water, continuing the boiling and stirring until the flour is cooked and the whole is clear, like starch. Add to this about half a tea-spoonful of essential oil of cloves or cinnamon, strain through a wire gauze or perforated tin strainer, and bottle in wide-mouthed jars, which should be corked to keep out dust.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 13 was sent out gratuitously an illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing further installments of FARJEON'S new Christmas Story, "GOLDEN GRAIN;" "THE PARISIANS," by LORD LYTTON; and "PHINEAS REDUX," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

Another illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 20.

☞ An EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, with magnificent full-page illustrations, containing the first part of a

NEW CHRISTMAS STORY

by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, of unusual brilliancy and interest, will be sent out gratuitously with the next Number of the BAZAR.

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of a Boy's Wardrobe, consisting of Sack Overcoat with Cape, Jacket, Vest, Knee Pantaloons, and Knickerbockers, for Boys from 4 to 9 Years old, will be published with our next Number. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 815.

SPARING THE ROD.

EVERY body has a theory about the management of children, and, considering that in every household, as a rule, there are two theories at least, if no more, it is wonderful that so few children fall to the ground, so to speak. Between both the small folks must have a hard time of it; and what must be the confusion in the immature brains when grandparents and aunts to the third and fourth generation infringe on the patent of authority with their own pet hobbies! Some one says that we should bear a steady hand, with a rod in it. Granted the steady hand; but we give in our verdict against the rod, which works no miracles, and is powerless to divine the hidden treasures of character.

Perhaps this may seem like impugning the wisdom of an authority so ancient as SOLOMON'S; but the old dispensation was utterly against sparing the rod in any thing; it was an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, till Christianity worked out the problem of man's deserts and necessities by another proportion, and gave us the solution in a new commandment. In all the world there is no such responsibility as the bringing up of a child in the way he should go; but the way he should go is not always that which is contrary to his nature and inclinations. Many seem to act upon the principle that if the child has no relish for any particular thing that appears good to the adult judgment, he must be disciplined into it. In this way church-going has been rendered distasteful to numbers, simply because the guardians of youth have not hesitated to inflict it upon them without alleviations before their unformed minds could grasp the shadow of an interest in service or sermon. It is to be feared that there are more rods than those of birch to be spared. The dark closet is worse than the Russian knout; public reproof hardens the sensitive mind; the deprivation of a meal has the effect of visiting the offenses of the will upon the body. But in the matter of absolute blows, it has been asserted that no one whips a child except in a passion, though we know that many a conscientious disciple of SOLOMON has administered this corrective more in sorrow than in anger, with a shrinking recognition of original sin, and a belief that the sooner the devil was whipped out of a subject the better. "I shall whip you for this when you go to bed at night," one of this school used to say, delaying the matter in hand, lest her wrath should lend impetus to the blow; and the wretched little culprit would wince every time she recalled it, and suddenly think of it in the midst of her games, till it blotted the sunshine, and spoiled the flavor of her food, and stole the sweetness out of the hours. But as surely as bed-time came, though she had suffered in anticipation all day, though she fondly hoped the promise had been forgotten, yet just so surely came its fulfillment from this mistaken mother, who loved her child beyond a doubt. Now if we consider the loss of nervous force that one such experience is capable of causing, the wear and tear that the mental pain brings about, and if we multiply it by the numerous occasions for correction that occur in a child's life, we shall reach some estimate of the probable loss of vitality to the system, which can never be repaired. And furthermore, each time that the rod is administered it leaves the victim in a condition less calculated to resist any wayward impulse. There are others, we are aware, who punish in hot blood, and think they are doing God's service, when a blow has been known to maim a child for life. A box with five nails in it is one of the favorite modes of torture, more dangerous in its effects than the thumb-screw of the Inquisition. It is such a handy method of giving discipline that it is almost irresistible to the provoked guardian of helplessness; it requires no preparation, and, besides taking the miscreant by surprise, offers him the advantages of astronomical observations. But, in truth, it is no joking matter, as many physicians can testify who have had the increasing brain diseases of children to contend with. The fact is, the frame of the most robust child is of such delicate structure, its muscles and fibres are in such a plastic, formative state, that the utmost tenderness is requisite to insure the complete mental and physical health.

Children are whipped for disobedience when they have totally forgotten the command, and their minds are not sufficiently matured to maintain it; they are often whipped when they are merely fretting an elder by their importunities; they are whipped for spoiling their clothes, accidents which are as grievous to the poor little souls as to their parents; they are whipped for ill tempers engendered by late hours, unwholesome food, and exposure at children's parties; for awkwardnesses at table, which bring their own sufficient punishment; for failures in lessons too hard for them, and for giving blow for blow. There is the mother who slaps back when her child offers her a blow in one of his tempers; but if she had never given him the first lesson in the use of the rod, do you think he would have evolved it from his inner consciousness, from the love of original sin? There are other women who spare the rod where their own children are concerned, but are not frugal of it to others that chance brings under their authority. A child coming in with its bruises to its mother, who was amused with company, impatient of interruption and deaf to its complaints, received a smart blow when it needed sympathy and comfort; and though another mother replies, "Oh, I never whip my children unless they need it richly," yet if the habit of whipping is once formed, the blows are sometimes in danger of falling, through heedlessness, upon unoffending heads. And here, perhaps, our opponents might cry, "How are we to punish children without the rod? Are we to allow them to run wild, unreproved? Shall we ignore their faults, and wink at their disobediences? We ourselves were brought up by the rod, and we flattered ourselves that we had not disgraced the method. Before a child can understand reason he can appreciate correction." But how can he appreciate correction before understanding reason? Doubtless he can appreciate pain; but it carries no lesson unless accompanied by reason, and when that is present, why not persuade it rather than resort to the scourge? The difficulty lies in the fact that it is vastly more troublesome to spare the rod than to use it; any body—who has the heart—can whip a child; it does not demand any strength of character, nor any patience, nor any invention, nor the least exercise of intellect, and only a small fraction of time, as every body knows. On the other hand, in sparing the rod we must not grudge the hours used in contending mentally with the faults of childhood, nor the cultivation of patience required; it may, it will, abridge our time for reading, interrupt our leisure, distract attention from the fashions, deprive us of some social intercouse, but the reward will far outweigh the effort. There are those who appear to regard children as so many hinderances to ease and comfort and order, and do not seem to remember that the fate of nations lies in the hands of a little child, and that in the same measure as his body is healthily fitted for its part here, and his soul for the inevitable Hereafter, in the same proportion will the heirs of the future refrain from following after strange gods. There is enough of pain and unhappiness in the nature of things certain to fall to the share of each human being, the knowledge of which should make us hesitate to add to it by so much as a finger's weight; and though it may be urged that the child is medicined in its youth to save it from greater miseries, yet have not other methods of regeneration proved as efficacious? Christianity has no weapons but charity and patience, and yet it works miracles.

ENGAGEMENTS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

IF we were writing a school composition on the subject of engagements, we should say there are many different kinds of engagements. There is the engagement between two hostile armies, the engagement between master and apprentice, and the engagement to marry between man and woman, which perhaps partakes somewhat of the nature of both the preceding forms of engagement. This latter, however, so lords it over all others as to be the engagement of the world—the one always meant unless some other be specified. If a man or a woman is reported "engaged," it would be considered a mere jest or witticism if any thing else than a marriage engagement were meant. So much for our title.

There is an almost universal disapprobation of long engagements, but there seems to be no prejudice whatever against engagements. In many communities an engagement seems to have as much moral force, as much binding power, as marriage. This is surely wrong. There ought to be no real marriage engagement except the marriage vow. Often the time between engagement and marriage is the only time which the high contracting powers have to form any real acquaintance with each other. That is little enough; but why should that little be deprived of its value by making the engagement a contract which it is as shameful to break, and from which it is as humiliating to retreat, as marriage itself? The young man and the young woman are mutually attracted, temporarily fascinated, superficially engaged. Under the glamour of love the chances are very much against their finding each other out before it is too late. But why make the engagement so iron-clad that even if they do find each other out, they can not act on their knowledge without incurring the disgrace and dishonor that wait on the broken word? If they are really adapted to each other, they need no outward bond to bind them together. Inward attraction is stronger than any, than all, outward force. If they are not adapted to each other, it is cruel to bring all the stress and strain of custom and character to keep them together when they have once begun, never so slightly, to draw apart.

This is a matter which belongs to parents rather than to children, to adult rather than to adolescent society. Nothing can exceed the reprobation with which we Americans behold the heartless Continental parent selecting the most eligible available match for his daughter, without regard to her preferences, precisely as he would buy her a house or a horse. Almost equally reprehensible, I sometimes think, is the laissez-faire manner in which the American father permits his inexperienced young daughter to drift, to drop, to rush into the arms of the man who happens to be around at the time.

"Never!" said an energetic mother, who had been discussing the mésalliance of a neighbor's child—"never!" and she set her teeth and puckered her brow into an expression that would have sent dismay to the breast of an ineligible young man—"never shall a young man come into my house that I would not be willing my daughter should marry!"

It may not be possible, it may not be necessary, it may not be effective, to carry matters with quite so high a hand. It may be that if every undesirable young man is unceremoniously brow-beaten off the front-door step, your daughter will meet him in the drawing-room next door, and fall ravenously in love with him. It may be, too, that you have unskillfully taken his measure, and that the match will be immediately and pre-eminently happy, and presently brilliant; that the objectionable young man will be the staff of your old age, and that you will tell a thousand times over to his merry children the tale of your aversion and his repulsion. So the late Lord Timothy Dexter sent out a cargo of warming-pans to the West Indies, which warming-pans, being used by the natives to boil molasses, came to be in great demand, and made Lord Timothy's fortune. All the same it remains that he was a silly lord, and that successful business is not ordinarily conducted by carrying coals to Newcastle. In love and in traffic, in spite of a few occasional exceptions, effects may be approximately calculated from causes. A girl, never so well trained and guided, may fortuitously and fatuously make a bad match, and a girl left to herself and the mere chances of life may stumble into a good match.

Yet, take society through, the girl is most likely to marry suitably whose parents are the head of the family; who command their society, and do not simply and indiscriminately accept what comes; who know the history, surroundings, and character of the young men who frequent their house; who cause themselves to be consulted and deferred to, and do not consider it the whole duty of the affectionate Christian parent to withdraw into the background and let the young men and maidens work out their own salvation and destruction. It is very much to the credit of Young America that it bears this test so well, but it would be very much to its benefit if it were not put to so severe a test. But fathers and mothers seem sometimes to proceed on the assumption that because they do not, and are not in the slightest degree moved to, fall in love with a young man or a young woman, therefore their sons and daughters will not. So they suffer the approach, they even themselves invite the presence, of young people out of kindness, or indifference, or indolent complacence, or for their own convenience—young people whose careless occasional company is not disagreeable to them, is perhaps rather agreeable than otherwise, but a close alliance with whom they would not for an instant contemplate; and some fine morning they awaken and find to their dismay that John and Jennie, that Sophie and Sam, have contracted an irresistible affection for each other, and are resolutely determined to be married or buried forthwith. Why should they not, indeed? Why should the father rage, and the mother imagine vain things? It is quite in the natural course of events, and the parents set the ball in motion. I should be very far from saying that a man or maiden takes whoever comes to hand, but every one knows that contiguity is an immense force in that process which is called "falling in love." If the parents furnished the contiguity, why should they complain of the consequences? It would be too bald and otherwise inadequate to say that if parents will not exert themselves to make good matches for their children, they need not be chagrined if the children make bad matches. In a country where marriage is assumed to be founded on love, and permits no outward resources, a too active intervention in procuring it might be dangerous; but there is neither danger nor unwisdom in every parent's doing every thing in his power to secure the opportunity and the probability of his child's marrying well if he marries at all. It is not dangerous for the father to supplement the daughter's inexperience, for the mother her son's, with their own experience. They may not be continually appearing on the stage as the Deus ex machina, but it is in their power to do behind the curtain a great deal of skillful, prudent, and perfectly honorable work to make this drama of the new lives run smoothly to the end.

One thing at least they can insist on, that an engagement shall be no engagement, but only an arrangement, and that marriage alone shall be irrevocable. As I have said, this must be done by the elders. The youngsters in their ecstasy will vow right and left, and I suppose we may as well say with Mrs. BROWNING, "Oh, lovely lady, let them vow!" but let the parents maintain, rising up early and maintaining it, that these vows have no force and no power beyond the moment that they are issued. Say to the young man, "I am quite willing you should marry my daughter if you both continue in the same mind. But if at any moment between this and the hour of your marriage her feelings change, I shall justify her in withdrawing from the marriage, and I shall hold you in like manner equally free. I hold you both free to fall in love with other persons, or to relinquish the society of each other without giving any reason and without incurring any reproach."

Does this seem to give up the trusting girl to the wiles of the gay deceiver, make her the prey of the fickle and the false? I think that trusting girl has rather had her day, and her ghost may as well be dismissed. But even the trusting girl is not half so much the prey of the flirt who trifles with and deserts her, as of the flirt who marries her because he lacks the courage not to. If affection and attraction can not stand the strain of association before marriage without a bond, it is not likely to stand it after marriage with a bond. However much of vigor and rigor it may be needful to infuse into marriage vows, I see no evil, and only good, in demanding that whatever vitality and whatever imperiousness is in the attachment that precedes marriage shall be the spontaneous outgrowth of each day and hour and moment; shall borrow no outward force from any past fervor, but shall be as strong or as weak as each instant finds or fashions it.

Hosted by Google

A relation which ought to hold will not be marred or affected by such an understanding, but it would provide a way of escape for some conscientious and beleaguered souls.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WOOLENS AND SILKS.

BLACK woolen stuffs are excepted from the general reduction of prices, as they are staple goods, do not go out of fashion, are universally worn, and consequently may be kept until another season without much loss. This is not true, however, of black silks. Some establishments announce a reduction of 75 cents a yard on silks worth over $2 a yard, and, indeed, all silk goods are lower-priced than at any time since the war. Black silks with the large Ottoman reps once thought so desirable show great reduction, costing only $3 50 or $4 a yard, instead of $5 or $7, as they formerly did. The medium grain, which is now more fashionable, is sold in excellent qualities for costumes at $2 50 or $3. This has fine lustre, and the faintest tinge of blue is over the black, which makes it especially handsome for associating with blue-black Lyons velvet. Colored silks in the dark shades used for skirts and trimmings of camel's-hair and cashmere costumes are sold for $2 a yard; these are not the heavily repped silks once chosen for suits, but are of the light quality and fine lustre now thought good enough, and, indeed, preferred, for this purpose. A smaller quantity is also bought of these, as two narrow side-pleatings around the skirt has become the most acceptable trimming. Striped silks cost from 75 cents upward.

The opportunity to get bargains is not confined to the necessary materials of ordinary dress, but extends to the region of velvets and garniture. Velvets with deep thick pile and of good blue-black color are sold for $9 or $10 a yard in the convenient three-quarter width preferred for cutting Dolmans, English jackets, and polonaises; lighter qualities, for basques, sleeveless jackets, flounces, and for skirts of suits, cost from $6 to $8. The narrow velvets for bonnets cost $3 50 or $4 a yard; these are also used for bias bands, piping, revers, and other dress trimmings. The garniture for velvet cloaks is also cheaper than formerly, as very handsome passementerie ornaments, consisting of jet sprinkled stars with pendent tassels, may be bought for $1 each, while those with very little jet are 50 cents. Simple open-worked galloons are sold for 50 or 75 cents a yard, but those so covered with jet beads as to appear to be solid jet are far more expensive. There is an attempt to introduce larger jet beads, but these are coarse-looking, and so heavy that they tear or cut the material with which they are worn. Thick silk fringe, with strands of jet beads twisted and pendent at intervals among the silk threads, is considered very stylish, and is much used for trimming the long over-skirts of black silk dresses.

WRAPPERS AND HOUSE DRESSES.

Ladies on economical thoughts intent make wrappers and house dresses of the repped materials which are now out of style for street suits. For instance, there are French and Irish poplins of good quality, though not Pim's best, for $1 a yard, in very good dark shades and in all warm bright hues. When trimmed with bias velvet bands or cords, these make elegant Watteau wrappers or simple house dresses, with basque and square over-skirts. Epingeline worth $1 25 a yard is now sold for 75 cents, and is very suitable for afternoon dresses that are not subjected to hard usage. For useful morning wrappers for home breakfast-tables and for service while performing household duties there are empress cloths in admirable cloth colors as low as 37½ cents a yard. The pressed opera flannels so excellent for dressing-gowns and invalids' robes cost now from 50 to 65 cents. There is a sudden caprice among stylish young misses for wearing costumes of gay Scotch plaids. Several of these have lately been imported for the school-girls of wealthy families, who are seen on the promenade arrayed in the bright Stuart or Victoria plaid made up of every color of the rainbow, or else the dark blue and green plaid so popular three years since. The costume is a short skirt, with two narrow kilt pleatings, and a tight long single-breasted redingote, trimmed with woolen ball fringe in which all the colors of the plaid enter. A blue and black plaid redingote with silver buttons and clasps is worn stylishly over a black silk skirt.

STEEL BEADS.

The latest Parisian fancy is to trim black cashmere wraps with gray crocheted passementerie in which glistening cut steel beads are introduced. A Dolman of black cashmere has a border of this kind with gray and black tassel fringe, and a black cashmere polonaise has the large side-pockets covered with this passementerie, while there are horizontal rows à la militaire across the fronts. The mixture of black and gray is also seen on sacques of cashmere braided all over with black soutache, sprinkled with steel beads, and edged with a band of the gray fur of the silver-fox, or else of chinchilla.

CONFIRMED FASHIONS.

The simple styles described early in the season have met with general approval, and new costumes are distinguished from those of last year by their absence of elaborate ornament. Over-skirts of costumes are longer and more simply shaped than ever. Some stylish over-skirts have the three front breadths fitted as plainly as the skirt beneath them, and reach within a fourth of a yard of the foot; the back breadths are then tied backward, draped in a pouf near the top, and hang almost to the edge of the demi-train; the fullness behind is sewed to the belt in two large double box-pleats that hang flatly instead of making a bouffant tournure. Fringe of silk and jet for silk dresses, and of woolen balls for camel's-hair and cashmere over-skirts, is more stylish than ruffles. A piped bias band, or else a narrow side pleating, is much used. Young ladies who have enough redingotes in their wardrobes have new woolen over dresses made with tight basques and the long over-skirts just described; these are so simply shaped, cling so closely, and are so devoid of trimming that they are called "habits," and do resemble riding-habits in appearance. An imported suit of this kind is in two colors of camel's-hair—dark gray and indigo blue. The gray skirt is bordered with two rows of narrow pleating, each four inches deep; these are pressed flatly half their depth, while the full lower edge is as loose as a ruffle. The long plain blue over-skirt simply hemmed has three smooth clinging front breadths, while the full back breadths are draped yet flat. The basque is without postilion pleats, and hangs in two square tabs behind. A standing English collar is around the neck, while folds and pleating edge the wrists of the tight sleeves. The hat worn with this costume is of indigo blue felt, turned down close to the ear on the left side, and turned up high on the right, trimmed with blue silk folds, and a curling ostrich plume in its natural gray shade.

NEW-YEAR'S, EVENING, AND RECEPTION DRESSES.

Dresses for the opera, evening parties, and the approaching New-Year's receptions do not partake of the simplicity advocated for street costumes. White Chambéry gauze and grenadine over dresses are the favorites of the winter, instead of the muslin ones so long worn. These gauzes have satin stripes over an inch wide, either white or in delicate blue or rose, and the silk skirt beneath them must match this stripe in color, and is trimmed with pleated flounces of the gauze arranged so that a stripe comes in each pleat. Pretty dresses for bride-maids are of white silk, with white stripes in the gauze basque, over-skirt, and pleatings, with wide flat sashes and garlands of crimson roses. Blue is the most prevalent color for evening dresses, and is especially pretty under a blue and white striped gauze over dress, with the pleatings on the skirt showing the blue stripes. With such a dress garlands of roses of various shades, from palest pink to deep crimson, are very effective. Stripes are also seen in other materials, such as silk and velvet. A French costume worn at an afternoon wedding has a polonaise of alternate stripes of white silk and black velvet, with a white silk skirt and striped pleatings; the bonnet for this dress is a fanciful Normandy crown of black velvet, with white and black plume and feather ruches. The princesse dresses described a year ago, when Worth revived them, are worn by matrons and elderly ladies for full-dress occasions. A dress prepared for receiving New-Year's calls is of plum blue silk, made with waist and skirt in one, in the princesse style, simply flounced around the demi-train and up the sides to the belt, while the plain front is merely ornamented with a row of steel buttons cut like diamonds, and very expensive. The back of the skirt has a puff at the top and a flat sash. Satin is being used again in Paris for trimming evening dresses, and is especially pretty when used with tulle or tarlatan. Young ladies wear tulle skirts covered to the belt with puffs and pleatings. The over-skirt is then made of two long square breadths of satin open in front, hanging smoothly on the sides, and drawn backward, in the fashion of the demi-polonaise. The waist is a basque of satin with tulle sleeves made of puffs around the arm. French dresses of latest importation have the basque and over-skirt trimmed with rows of hanging loops, like those on the beautiful bridal dress worn by Nilsson as Valentina in the opera of The Huguenots. The rolled cap above the sleeves and the double pointed ruff of the Cavalier costume are also worn. Rose-bud garlands are the fashionable garniture for young ladies' evening dresses, and the bouquet of natural flowers carried in the hand must correspond. These bouquets are large and round, and are made up of long-stemmed buds loosely put together in "Boston" fashion. Some are entirely of pink buds of various shades, others are of pale tea-rose with pink buds, or else lightest yellow buds and dark velvety crimson ones; violets are pretty with pink buds or with the pale tea-roses; heliotrope and pink buds, with merely the rose foliage, are seen together, and the odors blend deliciously. Thus there are fashions in bouquets as in other things, and the florist of to-day must be an artist in his way, providing not only perfect flowers and arranging them in unique combinations of color, but associating those whose perfumes enhance each other, instead of providing mixed bouquets with a dozen conflicting odors.

VARIETIES.

The prettiest warm bonnets for little girls are close cottage bonnets of white cony fur, trimmed with pink or blue ribbon, and sold for $4 or $4 50. They cover the ears and the back of the head, and are far more comfortable-looking than Normandy caps. Gray cony bonnets are also shown, but are not so child-like as those of pure white. Elaborate bonnets of black velvet are also made in the cottage shape for these "little women," and are trimmed with Valenciennes lace, ribbon, rose-buds, and ostrich tips. They cost from $9 to $12.

Ribbons are exceedingly cheap this season. Fancy stores fill their windows attractively with boxes of gros grain ribbon of every color and shade, two or three inches wide, at 25 cents a yard.

Ladies' walking shoes are made with thick projecting soles like those described for gentlemen, and with low broad heels. The high French heel is entirely out of fashion. Dull unpolished kid is chosen for street shoes, and the favorite shape remains the buttoned boot. Low slippers of black or of white satin are worn on full-dress occasions by young ladies instead of the buttoned gaiters formerly worn. The slipper is simply shaped, not covering the instep in the Marie Antoinette fashion, and displaying to advantage the elaborately embroidered and open-worked clocked stockings that are again in vogue.

For information received thanks are due Mrs. CONNELLY; and Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and A. T. STEWART & Co.

PERSONAL.

PROFESSOR HENRY, of the Smithsonian Institution, has received from the French government a superb porcelain vase, as a testimonial of his services as the United States representative of the commission on the international standard meter.

—Mr. NATHANIEL RIDLOW, of Saco, Maine, was such an eccentric old gentleman! Before dying, a few days ago, he requested that he should be buried in his wedding-clothes. It was done. The suit was of navy blue, and was first worn by Mr. RIDLOW fifty-one years ago. He was twice married, and wore the same suit on both occasions. The destructive moth had not fed upon its delicate warp and woof.

—M. ALPHONSE DE CANDOLLE has prophesied, in his recent Histoire des Sciences, the gradual decline and extinction of his native language, the Swiss. He calculates that at the end of another hundred years the English-speaking races in Great Britain, the Australian colonies, and the United States will number 860,000,000, while the German-speaking people will be only 124,000,000, and those who speak French not more than 69,000,000.

—The Count de Strzelecki, who died recently in London, was noted for careful explorations of Australia, and was the discoverer of gold in that colony.

—A good man, who refuses to disclose his name, has placed in the hands of the committee of the Birmingham and Midland Institute a large sum for the foundation of a lectureship on the laws of health, and also for a prize fund in connection with the class.

—Lady CAROLINE GUEST, of England, has an annual income of $1,500,000 from coal mines in Wales, and it is said that there are many bachelor homes where she would be a welcome guest. The difficulty is that, with an income sufficient to protect her from the pangs of hunger, and having comfortable lodgment, she is disinclined to "change her local habitation and her name."

—The old proverb that "corporations have no souls" has been proved inaccurate by an incident in London. Under the provisions of its ancient charter the governor and the corporation of the Bank of England are obliged not only to purchase at their fair value any precious metals tendered to them, but also to take charge of any gold or silver, in ingots or plate, that may be brought to them for safe-keeping. From time to time plate chests have been deposited with this view in the vaults of the bank, and many of them have been there so long that they are actually rotting away. On a recent occasion the servants of the bank discovered a chest which, on being removed, literally fell to pieces. On examining the contents a quantity of massive plate was discovered of the period of CHARLES II. This circumstance might not in itself be very interesting, but that there was found with the plate a parcel, which proved to be a bundle of old love-letters, carefully arranged according to their dates. An inspection of them revealed a correspondence of a tender and romantic description, carried on during the period of the Restoration. The name of the writer was found to be BERNERS, and, after considerable search among the archives of the institution, it was found that a family of that name had been connected with the bank about the time in question. Acting upon this clew, the directors prosecuted their inquiry, and being satisfied that a gentleman of the same name, now living, is a lineal representative of the owner of the plate and the love-letters, both have been handed to him. The newly discovered owner has permitted it to be shown to any one interested in the plate of the period. The love-letters are not, however, on view.

—When JOHN BRIGHT was announced to attend a public meeting in Alnwick in 1843, the editor of the Newcastle Journal (Tory) thus alluded to it: "It is stated that BRIGHT, the anti-Corn-law agitator, is expected to visit the wool fair which will be held at Alnwick shortly, in order to scatter the seeds of disaffection in that quarter. Should he make his appearance, which is not improbable (for the fellow has impudence for any thing of this sort), it is to be hoped there may be found some stalwart yeoman ready to treat the disaffected vagabond as he deserves." This "disaffected vagabond" is now a cabinet minister, and the principles he advocated at the Alnwick wool fair in 1843 have long since become a law.

—We have some sizable farms in the West, though few that will compare with the one in Australia recently sold by Messrs. T. & S. LEARMOUTH. The estate comprises about 26,695 acres, with dwelling-house and improvements, and carries 32,528 sheep and lambs, 966 head of cattle, and 29 horses. The improvements and stock were valued at $200,000. The purchaser of the whole property was Mr. SAMUEL WOOD, who gave for it $1,250,000.

—Sir ALBERT DAVID SASSON, having done very much in the cause of charity and in the promotion of education in India, has been presented with the freedom of London in a gold box of the value of one hundred guineas, that being the traditional figure in which London freedom is conferred upon unusually good men.

—Ex-Queen ISABELLA of Spain, having been secured an income sufficient to maintain her rank, partly through the aid of the ROTHSCHILDS, all litigation about her property will be abandoned.

—Colonel PHINEAS ADAMS, of Manchester, New Hampshire, has a collection of coins valued at ten thousand dollars. It is the result of thirty-one years of labor, and is nearly complete. One coin alone, a silver dollar of 1804, would probably bring eight hundred dollars in the market.

—Certain English people, admirers of Mr. CHARLES READE as an author, are about to present to him a testimonial portrait.

—Mr. DENT, the venerable father of the President's wife, is a native of Maryland. His father once owned all the land from Port Tobacco to the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, upon which a portion of the city of Washington is built. These lands were crown grants, for which patents were issued long prior to the Revolution. Evidently the DENT family was a distinguished one, for a letter recently received from a Miss MARGRET DENT, of England, contains the family tree and many pieces of information which are remembered as traditions in the American branch. This English lady resides on her estate, which is named Giesborough. This also is the name of the small town at the mouth of the Eastern Branch, and which is associated in the minds of Washingtonians as the place from whence emanated at the close of the war the foul odor of deceased army horses being converted into soap-grease. Mr. DENT's father lost much of his valuable lands about the time his family were growing up, through indorsement for a friend. Mr. DENT, then a young man, emigrated to Pittsburg, where he had a wealthy uncle, Mr. THOMAS CRUMMEL. However, he did not tarry with rich relations long, but pushed on to Louisville, where he commenced a successful commission business. He married the beautiful and gifted Miss RENSHALL, of Pittsburg, and after that settled in St. Louis. In that city he rapidly acquired wealth. His home was synonymous with elegance and hospitality. Mrs. DENT was a woman of fine qualities, and could render herself so agreeable that even before her daughters were grown, or had entered society, her parties and entertainments were considered the most elegant and charming in the city. The farm near St. Louis, which still belongs to the family, was purchased by Mr. DENT first as a country-seat for the summer only, but gradually he yielded to the temptation of the ease and luxury of a country home, and resigned both business and residence in the city.

—Many aristocratic gentlemen from England have found in Wet Mountain Valley, about twenty miles from Cañon City, Colorado, a place that to them is Elysium. HENRY TAYLOR has a nephew there, and the Duke of Somerset a son. A son of CHARLES KINGSLEY lives at Colorado Springs. Almost any day during the sporting season you may encounter a lord, in the roughest kind of a rig, out with a "scatter-gun" and a brace of "small dogs." They are so common, these lords and baronets, that our democratic bosoms scarcely thrill at the sight of one any more. About Cañon City there are great hunting grounds. At the hotel at this season you can be served with antelope, deer, elk, mountain-sheep, buffalo, bear, or prairie-dog.

—GEORGE F. ROBINSON has received the medal awarded to him by Congress in 1871 for saving the life of Secretary SEWARD when attacked by the assassin PAYNE on the night of the 14th of April, 1865. The medal was made at the United States Mint in Philadelphia at a cost of fourteen hundred dollars. On the obverse side of the medal Mr. SEWARD is represented lying in his bed, with the curtains drawn. Standing at the side of the bed is PAYNE, with an uplifted dagger in one hand, and with the other clutching the throat of ROBINSON. On the reverse side of the medal is a bust of ROBINSON, above his head a wreath of flowers, and on each side the following inscription: "For his heroic conduct on the 14th day of April, 1865, in saving the life of the Hon. W. H. SEWARD, then Secretary of State of the United States."

—The following is pronounced to be an authentic account of the origin of the friendly relations that so long subsisted between the late Sir EDWIN LANDSEER and the Duchess of Bedford. While the duchess was on a visit to the late Duke of Devonshire at Chatsworth, Derbyshire, she went, as was her custom, for a drive before breakfast. She drove, quite unattended, in the direction of Haddon Hall, near where it appears Sir EDWIN (then Mr.) LANDSEER was staying on a sketching tour. When near Rosely Bridge the horse took fright at something in the road, and dashed along at a furious pace. The artist, who was in the field hard by, seeing the extreme danger to which her grace was exposed, dropped book and pencil, sprang over the hedge, and at great risk succeeded in grasping the reins and stopping the terrified animal. Sir EDWIN conveyed her grace, who was very much frightened, to a house near at hand, and procured a carriage, in which she was taken back to Chatsworth, he following with the horse. Arriving at the house some little time after her grace, who had already informed the Dukes of Devonshire and Gordon, with the other guests, of the affair, Sir EDWIN was received with open arms and every expression of gratitude. Of course inquiries were made of Sir EDWIN as to his pursuits. He was promised the support of the whole party, as her grace was a great favorite. The Dukes of Devonshire and Gordon, together with the Duchess of Bedford, became enrolled among his warmest patrons. The first picture of any note painted by Sir EDWIN was for the late Duke of Gordon, the celebrated "Return of the Hunting Party," in which the figures of the Duke and Duchess of Bedford are conspicuous. This picture, so much and so justly admired, became his stepping-stone to success, and brought him a great number of commissions. Ever after the accident Sir EDWIN was the trusted friend and confidant of the duchess, as to his bravery she considered she owed her life. She loved him as a friend and brother, as did also her children and the principal members of her family. They were all, in spite of scandal, on intimate terms with him to his death, knowing full well the abominable rumors to be false.

Hosted by Google

Embroidered Cartridge-Pouch for Needle-Gun.

THE flap of this leather cartridge-pouch is covered with gray linen, which is embroidered with green and brown silk in button-hole, half-polka, and satin stitch, as seen in the description of the game-bag. The design will be given in the next Pattern-sheet number.

Embroidered Cartridge-Pouch for Breech-loading Rifle.

THIS leather cartridge-pouch is covered with gray linen, bound with leather, and furnished with metal clasps for closing. The linen is embroidered in button-hole, satin, and half-polka stitch. The design will be given in the next Pattern-sheet number.

EMBROIDERED CARTRIDGE-POUCH FOR NEEDLE-GUN.

Dog's Embroidered Collar and Leash.

THIS collar is made of leather, and is covered on the outside with embroidered gray linen. The edge of the collar is bound with leather. A steel buckle serves for closing. A ring is fastened on the collar, through which the leash is passed. For design see Fig. 53, No. XII., in the next Pattern-sheet number.

DOG'S EMBROIDERED COLLAR AND LEASH.

For design see next Pattern-sheet number, No. XII., Fig. 53.

Game-Bag, Figs. 1–3.

THIS game-bag is made of leather. The flap and strap are covered with embroidered gray linen. The sack, which is fastened in the bag underneath the flap, is knitted of gray twisted cotton and edged with fringe. To make the bag cut of leather two whole pieces from Fig. 21, Supplement, the front, however, only from the under edge to the next outline; then cut of leather one piece from Fig. 23, and two pieces from Fig. 24. Join the back and front of the bag with a soufflet, which consists of a straight strip of leather thirty-two inches long, an inch and three-quarters wide in the middle, and only seven-eighths of an inch wide toward the ends. Cover the flap with gray linen, which has first been embroidered. Fig. 23, Supplement, gives one-half of the design; the deer are worked with brown silk in button-hole stitch, and the leaves, flowers, and vines with green and brown silk in several shades in satin and half-polka stitch. Bind the flap on the edge, excepting the top, with a strip of leather, and sew it on the back of the bag according to the corresponding figures. Bind the edge of the parts, Fig. 24, also, and sew them on the bag according to the corresponding figures (leave the upper corners of Fig. 24, from the dotted line on, free for the present). On the upper corners of the bag set two heavy metal rings, each an inch and three-quarters in diameter; to do this draw the projecting corners of Fig. 24 through the ring to the dotted line, and sew them down on the wrong side of the bag. Fasten the strap on the rings in a similar manner; the strap is also made of leather covered with linen, and bound with a narrow strip of leather on the edge. The linen is ornamented in embroidery. The illustration Fig. 3 gives a full-sized section of the embroidery; the animals are worked with brown silk in button-hole stitch, and the leaves, vines, and acorns with brown and green silk in satin and half-polka stitch. On the corners of the bag set brass rings as shown by the illustration, which are designed for tying on the birds which are shot. For the sack inside the bag knit with gray cotton in the design shown by the illustration Fig. 2 (see the accompanying description) two equal parts from Fig. 22, Supplement. Crochet a foundation corresponding to the outer edge of Fig. 22, excepting the top, then take up the middle stitches of the foundation, and on these knit the foundation referred to. In order to obtain the shape of the pattern take up the requisite number of stitches from the foundation stitches at the end of each round. Sew up both halves of the sack on the outer edge excepting the top, knot in the fringe as shown by the illustration, and sew the back part of the sack on the front of the game-bag along the straight line. The foundation of the sack is knit with coarse unbleached cotton and steel needles. Work in rounds, going back and forth, on a foundation, the number of stitches of which should be divisible by 5, as follows: 1st round.—All knit plain. 2d round.—∗ Chain off 4 st. (stitch); to do this slip 1 st., knit off the next 4 st. each separately, and always draw the last st. over the st. knit off; then take up the last st. on the needle in the right hand on the needle of the left hand, and on this st. work 5 st., 1 k. (knit plain), 1 p. (purled), 1 k., 1 p., 1 k.; repeat from ∗. Knit these two rounds always alternately until the work is of the length required.

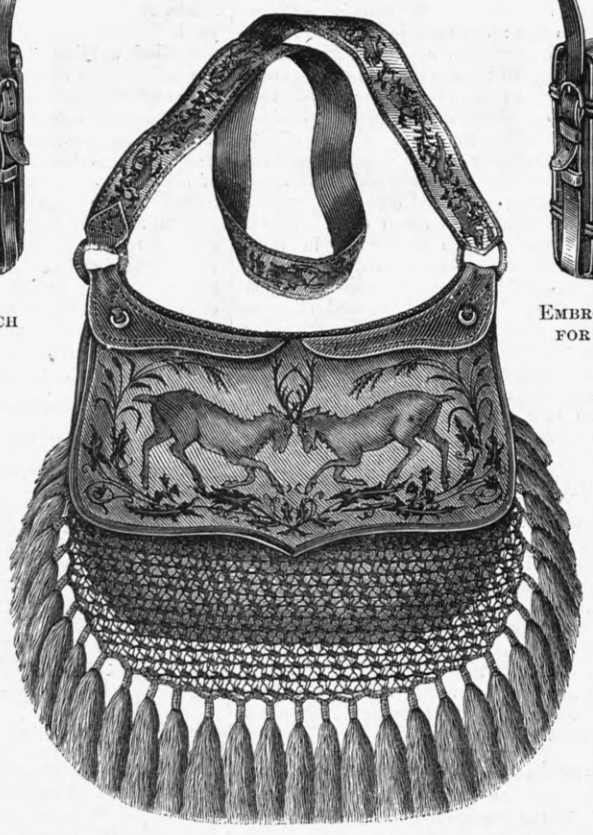

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED GAME-BAG.—[See Figs. 2 and 3.]

For pattern and design see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 21–24.

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED SHOT-POUCH.

For design see next Pattern-sheet number, No. XI., Fig. 52.

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED DRINKING FLASK.

EMBROIDERED SHOOTING MUFF.

For design see next Pattern-sheet number, No. X., Fig. 51.

Fig. 3.—EMBROIDERED POWDER-FLASK.

Embroidered Shot-Pouch, Drinking Flask, and Powder-Flask, Figs. 1–3.

THE covering of these articles consists of gray linen, which is ornamented with brown and green silk in button-hole, satin, and half-polka stitch. The design for the shot-pouch, Fig. 1, will be given in the next Pattern-sheet number, Fig. 52, No. XI. The designs of the drinking flask, Fig. 2, and the powder-flask, Fig. 3, will be published in the next Pattern-sheet but one.

EMBROIDERED CARTRIDGE-POUCH FOR BREECH-LOADING RIFLE.

Embroidered Shooting Muff.

THIS muff is designed to be slung around the neck when shooting, in order to enable the sportsman to warm his chilled hands, which often cause him to miss his aim. It is made of gray cloth, lined with fur, and interlined with wadding, and is embroidered on the upper part. The embroidery is worked with brown and green silk. The sides are bound with strips of fur. The design will be published in the next Pattern-sheet number, Fig. 51, No. X.

Crochet Insertion for Lingerie, etc.

See illustration on page 805.

THIS insertion is worked crosswise, in rounds going back and forth, with twisted crochet cotton, No. 60. Make a foundation of 43 st. (stitch), and in connection with this crochet as follows: 1st round.—Pass over 9 foundation st., ∗ 3 dc. (double crochet) on the next st., 2 ch. (chain stitch), 3 dc. on the next st., pass over 6 st., 2 dc. on the next st.; the upper veins of these dc., however, are not worked off each separately, but together, drawing the thread through once; 10 ch., 2 dc. like the last 2 on the next st., pass over 6 st., and repeat once from ∗, then 3 dc. on the following st., 2 ch., 3 dc. on the next st. 2d round.—6 ch., ∗ 3 dc. on the next 2 ch. between 3 dc. in the preceding round, 2 ch., 3 dc. on the same ch. on which 3 dc. have already been crocheted, 9 ch.; repeat once from ∗; then 3 dc. on the next 2 ch. between 3 dc., 2 ch., 3 dc. on the same ch. on which the last dc. were worked. 3d round.—Like the second round. 4th round.—6 ch., ∗ 3 dc. on the next 2 ch. in the preceding round, 2 ch., 3 dc. on the same ch. on which the last dc. were worked, 5 ch., 1 sc. (single crochet) on the middle st. of the next 3 ch. scallops above each other in the first, second, and third rounds, 5 ch.; repeat once from ∗; then 3 dc. on the next 2 ch. between 3 dc., 2 ch., 3 dc. on the same ch. on which the last dc. were worked. 5th round.—6 ch., ∗ 3 dc. on the next 2 ch. in the preceding round, 2 ch., 3 dc. on the same ch. on which 3 dc. were already crocheted, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the first of these 3 ch., 2 dc. on the next ch. after 3 dc. in the preceding round, working off the upper veins of these 2 dc. not each separately, but together, pass over 9 st., 2 dc. like the last 2 on the next st., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the first of these 3 ch.; repeat once from ∗; then work 3 dc. on the next 2 ch. between 3 dc. in the preceding round, 2 ch., 3 dc. on the same ch. on which the last dc. were worked. 6th round.—6 ch., ∗ 3 dc. on the next 2 ch. in the preceding round, 2 ch., 3 dc. on the same ch. on which dc. were already worked, pass over 7 st. of the preceding round, 2 dc. on the next st., working off the separate veins of these 2 dc. not each separately, but together, 10 ch., 2 dc. like the last 2 on the same st., pass over 7 st. of the preceding round; repeat once from ∗; then 3 dc. on the next 2 ch. between 3 dc., 2 ch., 3 dc. on the same ch. on which the last dc. were worked. Now repeat always the 2d–6th rounds until the insertion is of the requisite length.

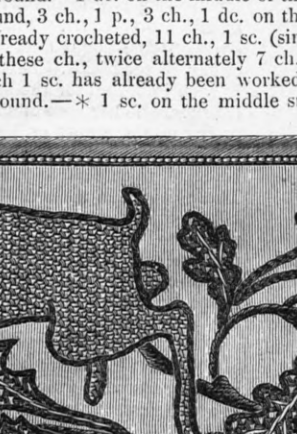

Fig. 2.—KNITTED FOUNDATION FOR GAME-BAG. FULL SIZE.

Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc.

See illustration on page 805.

THIS edging is worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 60, lengthwise, on a foundation of the requisite length, in the following manner: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet) on the next st. (stitch), 1 ch. (chain stitch), with this pass over 1 st. 2d round.—∗ 1 dc. on the next st., 3 ch., 1 p. (picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 single crochet on the first of these), 3 ch., 1 dc. on the same st. on which 1 dc. was already crocheted, 7 ch., with these pass over 9 st. of the preceding round; repeat from ∗. 3d round.—1 dc. on the middle of the next 7 ch. in the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the same st. on which 1 dc. was already worked, 7 ch.; repeat from ∗. 4th and 5th rounds.—Like the third round. 6th round.—1 dc. on the middle of the next 7 ch. in the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the same st. on which 1 dc. was already crocheted, 11 ch., 1 sc. (single crochet) on the fourth of these ch., twice alternately 7 ch., 1 sc. on the same st. on which 1 sc. has already been worked, 3 ch.; repeat from ∗. 7th round.—∗ 1 sc. on the middle st.

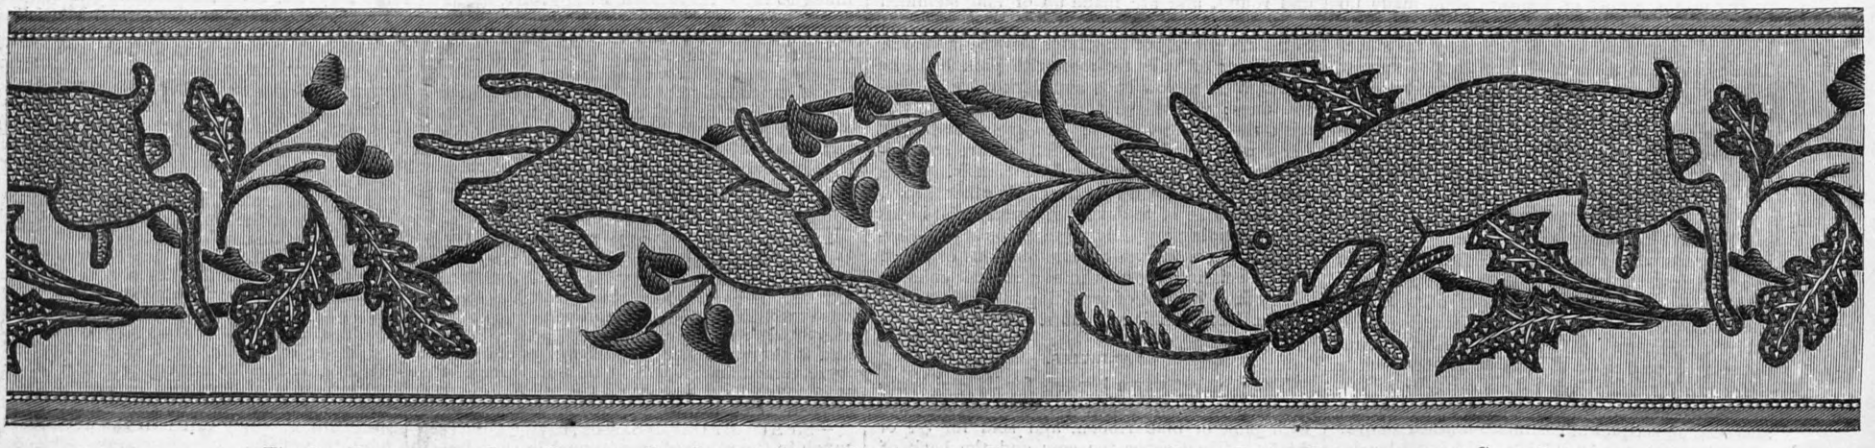

Fig. 3.—BORDER FOR GAME-BAG AND GUN-STRAP.—SATIN, BUTTON-HOLE, HALF-POLKA, AND POINT RUSSE EMBROIDERY ON GRAY LINEN.

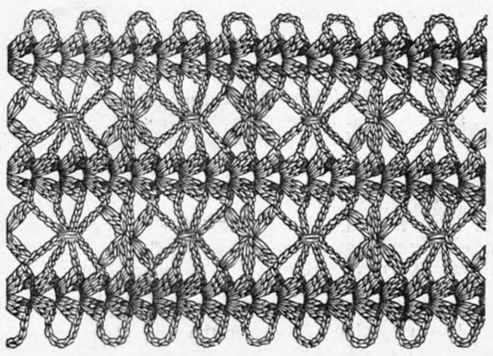
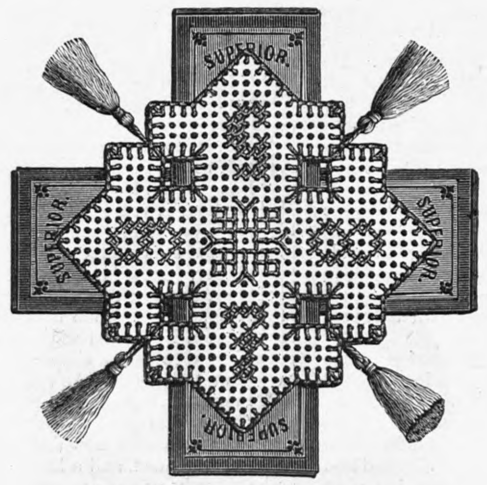
Hosted by Google



CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

of the next p. in the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the first of the next 3 ch. loops, twice alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch. loop, then 3 ch.; repeat from ∗. 8th round.—1 sc. on the next sc. in the preceding round, ∗ twice alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc.; repeat from ∗. 9th round.—∗ 1 sc. on the ch. beside the next sc. in the preceding round, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. scallop after the next sc., three times alternately 4 ch., 3 dc., 4 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. scallop on which the last sc. was worked, then 4 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the second following sc., 1 sc. on the ch. after the next sc., 4 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. scallop after the next sc., three times alternately 7 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. scallop on which 1 sc. was already crocheted, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the second following sc.; repeat from ∗. 10th round.—∗ Three times alternately 1 sc. on the ch. before the next 3 dc. in the preceding round, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. after the next 3 dc., 5 ch., but in the third repetition always crochet, instead of the last 5 ch., only 3 ch., then 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop consisting of 7 ch. in the preceding round, twice alternately 4 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop consisting of 7 ch., then 3 ch.; repeat from ∗.

BARATHEA HOOD.



NEEDLE-CASE.—FULL SIZE.

Needle-Case.

THIS case is designed for holding papers of needles. It is made of white perforated board, lined with lustring, ornamented in cross stitch embroidery with colored silk, and is finished with tassels.

Barathea Hood.

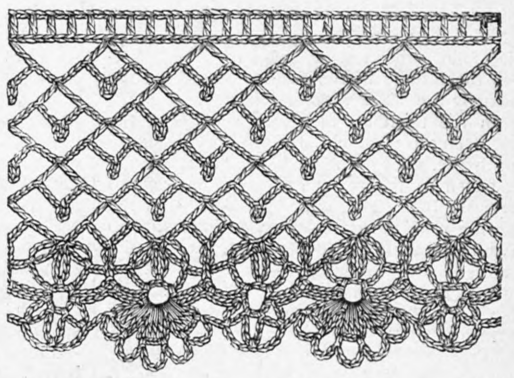
THIS hood of blue barathea is thinly wadded and lined with lustring. The trimming consists of ruches, rolls, and bows of gros grain of the same color.

Crochet Tidy.

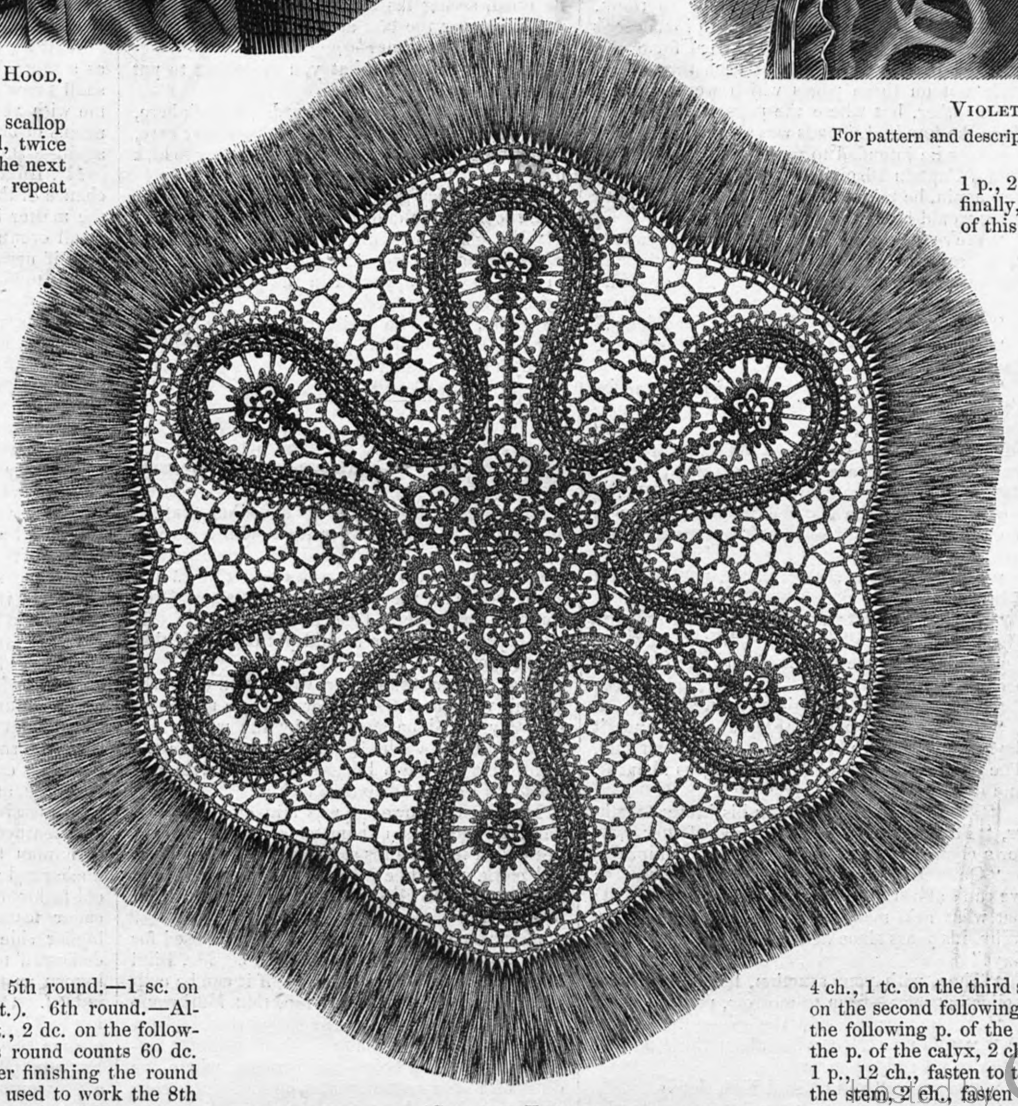
THE original is worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 40, all in connection, and trimmed on the outer edge with knotted fringe three inches and a quarter deep. Begin the tidy from the middle with a foundation of 4 st. (stitch), which are closed in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch). Then work the 1st round.—6 sc. (single crochet) on the ring. 2d round.—On each st. of the preceding round work 2 sc. (thus 12 st.). In this round, as well as in the 3d and 4th rounds, always insert the needle in both upper veins of the st. 3d round.—On each st. of the preceding round work 2 sc. (thus 24 st.). 4th round.—6 ch. (chain stitch), the first 3 of which count as first dc. (double crochet), then always alternately 1 dc., 3 ch.; with the latter pass over 1 st. each of the preceding round. At the end of the round work 1 sl. on the last of the 3 ch. which count as first dc. 5th round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round (thus 48 st.). 6th round.—Always alternately 3 dc. on the following 3 st., 2 dc. on the following st. in the preceding round, so that this round counts 60 dc. Instead of the first dc., crochet 3 ch. After finishing the round the thread is left hanging, and is afterward used to work the 8th round. Crochet the 7th round with a new thread as follows: 1 sc. on the free upper vein of a sc. in the 5th round, ∗ 7 ch., 1 sc. on the free upper vein of the fourth following sc. in the 5th round, and repeat ten times from ∗; then 7 ch., fasten to the first sc. of this round with 1 sl., fasten the thread and cut it off. The ch. scallops thus formed rest on the dc. round. 8th round.—In this round are worked all the flowers of the tidy in connection. ∗ On the middle st. of the next ch. scallop, and at the same time on the corresponding dc. below in the 6th round, work 1 sc. If the thread left hanging in the 7th round is not at this point, work sl. to the corresponding st. Then crochet + 17 ch., the first 3 of which form the stem of one of the lower flowers nearest the middle rosette. The last 5 of these ch. are closed in a ring with 1 sl., then work 2 ch., with these pass over the next 2 ch., and on the 7 ch. following these work 5 dc., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 1 sc. This forms the centre of the calyx. Turn the work, and on the other side of these 7 ch. work 4 sc., 1 p. (picot, consisting of 5 ch, and 1 sl. on the first of these), 3 sc., then 1 dc. on the ring, and five times alternately 1 ch., 1 p., 1 ch., 1 dc. on the ring, fasten to the next dc. of the calyx, 4 ch., fasten to the opposite dc. before the first of the 5 p. on the wrong side of the work with 1 sl., so that the 4 ch. lie underneath the partly finished calyx of the flower. Then again crochet on the upper side of the work 10 ch., 1 dc. on the following dc. of the preceding row, then 3 times alternately 8 ch., 1 dc. (the dc. always on the following dc. of the preceding row); finally, 10 ch. and 1 sl. on the next dc.; then turn the work, on the first and last ch. scallop work 13 sc. each, on the middle 3 ch. scallops work 11 sc. each, and, finally, 1 sl. on the last dc. Again turn the work, always insert the needle in the back vein of the upper two veins of a st. in the preceding round (similar to the ribbed crochet st.), and on the first scallop work 6 sc. on the next 6 st., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next 2 st., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next 2 st., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next 3 st., pass over 1 st.; on the second scallop work 3 sc. on the next 3 st., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next 2 st., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next 2 st., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next 3 st., pass over 1 st.; on the third (middle) scallop work 3 sc. on the next 3 st., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next 2 st. The upper middle of the flower thus far finished is now reached. For the stem work in a hollow of a scallop of the tidy (see illustration) a foundation of four times alternately 5 ch., 1 p., then 2 ch., 1 p.; repeat from + in this round until the upper middle of the middle scallop of the second flower is reached. On the second half of this flower crochet, corresponding to the first half, sc. and p., then 1 sl. on the second following ch. of the flower, and on the following st. of the calyx 1 sc. each, in doing which always insert the needle in both upper veins of the stitches; after the first 3 sc. work 1 p. On the under end of the calyx work 1 sl. on the lower sc. there, and on the stem work 2 sc., 1 p., 2 sc., then three times alternately 1 p., 5 sc., finally, 1 p., 3 sc., 2 ch. These and the first 2 ch. of this stem form the middle p. in the middle scallop of the first flower. Complete this flower like the one worked last, work 3 sc. on the stem consisting of 3 ch., then work 4 sc. on the following 4 dc. of the 6th round; 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop, and at the same time on the dc. behind it, 2 sc. on the following 2 dc., 8 ch., 1 sl. on the preceding third sc. of this round (thus passing over the sc. crocheted last); to do this draw the needle out of the st., insert it in the corresponding st., and draw through the loop, which was dropped. On this scallop crochet 3 sc., 1 p., 3 sc., 6 ch., fasten to the last p. of the fifth scallop of the next flower, 6 ch., fasten to the third of the 6 ch. worked first, 3 ch., 1 sl. on the sc. worked last, then 3 sc., 1 p., 3 sc. on the ch. scallop, 2 sc. on the following 2 dc. of the 6th round; repeat five times from ∗, but in working the following flowers nearest the inner rosette, instead of working the third ch. of the first p. on the first scallop, fasten to the fourth ch. of the ch. scallop to the right, and in the second p. fasten to the opposite p. of the flower worked previously (this is the p. before the last on the fifth scallop of the flower already finished). 9th round.—Lay on the thread anew. All picots in this round should be turned downward. ∗ 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the upper middle p. of one of the flowers in the hollow of the scallops, 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the third sc. after the following p., 3 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 stc. on the second following p., 4 ch., 1 p., 4 ch., 1 tc. on the third sc. after the next p., 4 ch., 1 p., 4 ch., 1 stc. on the second following p., 3 ch., 1 p., 6 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the following p. of the flower, 8 ch., fasten to the second sc. after the p. of the calyx, 2 ch., fasten to the third last of the 8 ch., 2 ch., 1 p., 12 ch., fasten to the third sc. after the second following p. of the stem, 2 ch., fasten to the third last of the 12 ch., 2 ch., 1 p., 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the seventh of the 12 ch. worked previously,

VIOLET CASHMERE HOOD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Fig. 18.



CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.



CROCHET TIDY.

3 ch., fasten to the third of the 12 ch., 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the fourth ch. after the p. which follows the last stc., 4 ch., 1 p., 4 ch., fasten to the middle of the 5 ch. between 2 p., as shown by the illustration, 4 ch., 1 p., 4 ch., 1 dc. on the third sc. after the next p. of the stem, 3 ch., 1 p., 5 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., fasten to the third sc. after the following p. of the stem, 2 ch., fasten to the second of the 3 ch. worked previously, 3 ch., 1 tc. on the third sc. after the following p. of the next flower, 4 ch., fasten to the third of the 5 ch., 4 ch., 1 p., 4 ch., 1 dc. on the second sc. after the following p., 3 ch., 1 p., 6 ch., 1 stc. on the third sc. after the second following p., 3 ch., 1 stc. on the third sc. after the third p. of the following flower (the two picots already fastened are passed over), 4 ch., fasten to the third of the 6 ch., 3 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the second sc. after the second following p., 4 ch., 1 p., 7 ch., 1 tc. on the third sc. after the next p., 4 ch., fasten to the third sc. after the next p. of the stem, 2 ch., fasten to the second of the 4 ch. worked previously, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the third of the 7 ch. worked before the tc., 2 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third sc. after the next p. of the stem, 4 ch., 1 p., 7 ch., 1 p., 8 ch., 1 p., 10 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the middle of the 7 ch. between the 2 p. worked after the dc., 2 ch., 1 p., 4 ch., fasten to the third sc. after the next p. of the stem, 2 ch., fasten to the second of the last 4 ch., 2 ch., fasten to the eighth of the 10 ch., 3 ch., fasten to the fourth of the 10 ch., 2 ch., 1 p., 5 ch., fasten to the second sc. before the p. of the calyx, 2 ch., fasten to the third of the 5 ch., 5 ch., fasten to the first p. of the flower, 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the fifth of the 8 ch. worked last, 3 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 stc. on the following p., 3 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 tc. on the third sc. after the following p., 4 ch., 1 p., 4 ch., 1 stc. on the second following p., 3 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 tc. on the third sc. after the following p., 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch.; repeat five times from . Finally, 1 sl. on the first stc. in this round. 10th round.—Always alternately 1 dc., 1 ch.; with the latter either pass over 1 st. or no st., as may be required. Instead of the first dc., crochet 3 ch. At the end of the round fasten to the third of these ch. with 1 sl., turn the work, and on the wrong side crochet the 11th round.—On each st. work 1 sc. Then turn the work again, and crochet the 12th round. On each st. work 1 dc., always inserting the needle in the back vein of a st. Care should be taken that the work does not draw, and therefore 2 dc. should occasionally be worked on 1 st. 13th round.—Like the 6th round. 14th round.—On each st. of the 12th round work 1 sc.; after every 4 sc. work 1 sc., inserting the needle in the middle st. of the following ch. scallop in the 12th round, and at the same time in the st. behind this st. 15th round.—Always alternately 1 dc., 1 ch. In the upper middle of each scallop pass over with the ch. alternately three times 1 st. each, then once no st., on the sides of the scallop with each ch. pass over 1 st., and in the lower middle of the scallop pass over 2 st. now and then with 1 ch. 16th round.— 2 dc. separated by 2 ch., 1 p. and 2 ch. on the next ch.; 1 ch., pass over 4 st., and repeat from *. Between every two scallops work, as shown by the illustration, a guipure-like foundation of ch. scallops and p., going back and forth, and fastening either to the edge st. of the scallops, or to one of the guipure-like scallops, as may be required. On the outer edge this guipure foundation should end in a straight line with the scallops of the tidy. Finally, crochet on the outer edge of the tidy always alternately 1 dc., 5 ch.; with the latter pass over 4 st. Into each of these ch. scallops set two fringe strands.

(Continued from No. 49, page 775.)

THROUGH FIRE AND WATER.

A Tale of City Life.

By FREDERICK TALBOT,

Author of "The Winning Hazard," "Jack Pugh's Legacy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XII.

"Here's a knocking, indeed!"

Not a trace could they find of the Reverend Mr. Jones. He had vanished, gone out of existence apparently, utterly and completely lost.

Lucy Hulse was in a state of restless miserable agitation; at one moment conjuring up all kinds of dreadful events that might have happened; at another persuading herself that all her misery was uncalled for. He was coming, was here this moment! That footstep which echoed along the street, was it his?

It was trouble heaped upon trouble, too, to find that she was utterly cut off from the sympathy of her friends. What could it be that had raised up between them and her this cold wall of stupor or indifference? Her mother thought of nothing but of her father; he, sullen and morose, seemed utterly lost to all outward impressions. But her brother's attitude to her troubled her most. Instead of active, hopeful help, he gave her nothing but discouragement. He even ventured to cast aspersions on John. Perhaps he had repented him, he suggested, and gone off, like a coward, to avoid carrying out his promise—her John, who was half saint and half hero. No, not from her brother, not from any one, would she hear any slur cast upon her lover!

Thus she flitted about, restless and uneasy, like a bird deprived of her young, questioning all she met, reproaching every one with indifference. Her brother she continually followed and watched. There was a reserve in his manner that made her think he knew something, and concealed it from her.

Edward didn't leave the premises the second day after the fatal Sunday. He spent the whole time in the old warehouse in his workshop. He went out to a timber-yard and selected some oak planks, and then on to a packer's, a friend of his, from whom he begged a few strips of iron banding and a roll of water-proof cloth. As he entered the postern with his load under his arm, he met his sister.

"What have you got there, Edward?" she cried, sharply.

"Going to make a box for my tools," he said.

"And that water-proof?"

"To keep the damp from them."

"Oh!" she said, but watched him narrowly still.

Edward himself took some precautions. He barred the outer door securely with its rusty old bars, examined the fastenings of the rotten shutters, and then set to his work energetically. He came in at meal-times. His appetite didn't seem to fail him. But he was altogether changed and altered. He never whistled or sang, but went about in a dull melancholy way that was wretched to witness. But he still stuck to his carpenter's work.

Tap, tap, tap, Ned's hammer had gone all the morning, till at last Captain Blackman, the director, whose turn it was to attend at the offices of the Company, to look over the books and sign the necessary checks, threw open the window of the counting-house, and shouted:

"Warehouse ahoy! You in the carpenter's shop!"

The warehouse door was presently held ajar, and Edward's white face appeared.

"Ho! it's you, Master Ned, is it, kicking up that confounded din! Are you making a coffin?"

Edward came forward, locking the door carefully behind him.

"I'm making a tool-box, that's all, Captain Blackman," said Ned; "but if my noise disturbs you, I'll leave off."

"Well, you see, mate," said the captain, jumping off his office chair, and beginning to stamp on the floor to restore the circulation of his limbs, "I'm adding up these blessed books; and when I get to the bottom of the ladder and say carry one, that confounded hammer of yours comes in tap-a-tap-tap, and I carry two instead—ay, perhaps three—and then it's all wrong. There, take the confounded books," cried the captain, pushing them away from him; "humbugging purser's work; tot 'em up for me, there's a good chap. I never made a long row of figures come to the same thing twice in all my life."

Edward took his seat at the desk, and began to add up the figures for the captain. They were all right—each column added up to the right amount—and yet the figures seemed to gather bulk with unnatural rapidity. They were his father's figures, neat and plain. Fleetwood took great pains with his figures, and prided himself upon their legibility. At last, in turning over a leaf, Edward suddenly came to a knowledge of what these figures meant.

Did he start? Did he turn pale? Were the eyes of Captain Blackman fixed upon his face? Had he in any way betrayed what he had seen?

The captain laid his hand upon Edward's arm, who started guiltily.

"I've been wondering how you run up those figures as you do. Don't it make your head ache? Lay by, my lad, a bit, and spin a yarn with me."

Edward put away the book with a sigh of relief. He had a few moments now to think. What was this he had discovered in his father's books? Simply that he had carried forward a hundred pounds too much at each turn of the leaf; not on those pages which were opposite one another, but where the pages turned over; there the hundred pounds was slipped on. That was how he intended to make up his deficiency. And if Captain Blackman took to add up the figures again, he might discover it; and then every thing would be lost.

"We're going to have great improvements here," said the captain; "we shall be turning you out of your workshop directly, Master Ned."

"How's that?" cried Edward.

"Oh, we're going to pull the old place down."

"Pull it down—why? Don't pull it down, Captain Blackman."

"Ha! and pay a couple of hundred a year for a tool-house for you—tool-house and dog-kennel, eh? How's the old dog now—Scipio? Quite blind, is he? Ah, we all get old and worn out. Your father and I are wearing out like the rest. But he don't look so hearty as me, Ned. Quite peaky he's been the last few weeks. And you too, my lad, you don't seem half as hearty as you should."

"Father wants a change of air, I think," said Edward.

"Well, why don't you take him off somewhere? The yard will be all in a mess for the next few days, what with the workmen and the old lumber."

"So soon—do they begin so soon?"

"Why not, why not? What should they wait for? Rickety old place; it positively isn't safe. The city surveyor has been warning us about it, and down it comes."

"Then," said Ned, knitting his brows together, "I'll take the opportunity to get father away for a change. To the Isle of Wight, I think."

"Quite right, my lad; good men are scarce; we can't afford to lose our old friend Fleetwood; but what he'll make of a holiday I can't think. Why, it's years since he left his desk for a single day!"

"Then, with your sanction, he shall take his holiday at once—from to-morrow, perhaps?"

"By all means," said the captain, cheerfully. "And now, Ned, what about these books? They're all right, you say?"

"They are all right," said Ned, slowly.

"Couldn't be wrong; your father is so particular. Why, I remember once, Ned, he sat up half the night about a farthing! Oh, he's a valuable man, your father! Wonderful how he took to business, after his bringing up. Ah, what a pity old Paston didn't leave him something handsome in his will, instead of endowing those blessed idiots!"

"Yes, it was a disappointment to father," said Edward, with a sigh.

"I should think it was. Why, do you know, Ned, I thought you'd have been remembered in his will pretty handsomely. The very day he died he had a long talk with me about you and your father. He didn't like Fleetwood much; couldn't appreciate him. Fleetwood was a man of much higher position than Paston. But he took to you, Ned; and when I told him what a capital hard-working chap you were, and how saving and contriving, he seemed quite pleased and interested. And said I to myself, 'Ned's in for twenty thousand.' But he died that very day; you remember how suddenly."

Edward nodded, and a lump rose in his throat as he thought of the dreams and aspirations of those days, and compared the wretched, miserable present.

"Well, I'll leave these books now. I think I've done a pretty good morning's work, and I'll go and have a crack with your father, and you go back to your coffin-making."

"It's a tool-box, a box for my things; nothing else," cried Edward.

"Of course that was only my fun," cried the captain. "Good-day to you, Edward."

Ned's hammer went faster and faster till about five o'clock, when it was getting dusk; and then he went out to his friend's the packer's, and gave him some dimensions.

After dinner, when the Hulses were sitting silently round the fire, they heard the postern open, and a rumbling, roaring sound, like distant or stage thunder.

"What's that?" said Lucy, starting up, running down to the door—she was now sensitive to every sound. Edward followed her.

"It's only a tin box I've had made," he said, as he saw a man advancing up the yard with a square tin case on his head, the loose and waving sides of which gave rise to thunderous vibrations. "Come this way," cried Edward, snatching up a lamp.

He led the man into the workshop in the old warehouse. The rumbling tin case fitted neatly into the wooden box that Edward had now finished. The sides of the tin case were higher than the sides of the box, so that they could be folded over the square tin cover; the whole well soldered down would form an air-tight, water-tight envelope.

"Shall I stop and help you to pack it?" said the man.

"No, thank you," said Edward.

"Then I'll come and sodder it up for you in the morning, shall I?"

"Can't you leave your iron here, and your soldering pot? I should like to know how to do it myself."

"There ain't no secret in it: you puts a few bits of charcoal under her, and you melts the sodder, and then you folds over the tin nice and even, and then you runs the iron over all the crevices. Mind the corners specially; 'tis there it will leak if it leaks at all; and then the job's done."

"Thank you, my friend," said Edward, giving him a liberal gratuity.—"Good Heavens, Lucy!" he cried, seeing his sister looking like a ghost standing over the box at the farther end of it. "What do you want?"

"I want to know what you are going to put into that box?"

"Only my tools," said Edward. "Look here, Lucy; I can't have you rummaging about here, upsetting things. Come along; I'm going to lock up."

He took Lucy gently by the arm, and led her forth, locking the door behind him.

"I'm going out now," he told his sister, and made for the postern. At the moment he opened it Markwood appeared in the portal, his face agitated and distressed.

"Why, Ned," he whispered, coming in and shutting the door behind him, "what's this that has come out about you?"

CHAPTER XIII.

"Howsomever their hearts are severed, their heads are both one."

Mr. Bilfil had made up his mind that he ought to take some farther steps with regard to his wife before he left England. It was absolutely necessary for his future welfare that he should stand well with the world on this matter. His conduct had hitherto been unexceptionable. It was necessary that he should put on record that it had been so.

Now, Paston, the lawyer, was a man of mark, and his version of the matter was one that most probably would be accepted by the world. If Bilfil could persuade Paston that he was in the right, and his niece hopelessly in the wrong, it would be a great advantage to him.

Mr. Paston, however, was still on the Continent. Under these circumstances, Mr. Bilfil condescended to make his statement to his confidential clerk. He knew Markwood very well, and he knew that in all such matters he had the ear of his chief.

Markwood was a man not at all indisposed for snug little dinners in vacation-time. Mr. Bilfil knew of this amiable weakness—if it can be called a weakness. He knew, too, that Markwood didn't care for plate-glass and crystal and silver, but rather preferred some old-fashioned city tavern, with wooden boxes and benches, where one dined off willow-pattern plates, on succulent steaks and juicy chops, but where the ale is bright, and the stout creamy, and the whisky mellow, and where there is still to be had a bottle of good old port.

Such a banquet did Bilfil prepare for Markwood; and when it was finished, and Markwood's face was glowing with satisfaction at the fare, and his mind full of all sorts of social impulses, he proposed that Markwood should finish off with a pipe and a "go of cork" in the little smoke-room up stairs. There was no one else in the room when they entered.

It was a little dull room, containing three or four oblong mahogany tables, fixed to the floor, on each of which were placed a tin match-box in the centre and a surrounding quadrangle of long clay pipes. Half a dozen Windsor-chairs, a fly-blown looking-glass over the fire-place, flanked by a couple of polished horns containing spills, and on the floor an indefinite number of spittoons, formed the furniture of the room. Its windows looked out upon a roof of ridged tiles, over which peered sundry upper-story windows and a few chimney-stacks of besooted bricks.

Mr. Bilfil seated himself with his back to the window, while Markwood took his place at the opposite end of the table.

"Now, Markwood," said the financier, "I want to consult you about a private affair of my own. You know all about the circumstances of my marriage?"

Markwood said that in a general way he knew that Mr. Bilfil had married the niece of Gilbert Paston.

Then Bilfil gave him an account of the circumstances attending his separation from his wife, admitting that he might have committed some faults in judgment in dealing with Mrs. Bilfil, but stating with perfect truth that she had left him without any adequate provocation, and had, in a very uncalled-for way, employed as her negotiator young Hulse, her cousin and former lover.

"As for that," said Markwood, "I know that to be all right. There isn't a more honorable, straightforward fellow in the world than Ned Hulse. I don't see how he could help taking her part, being her cousin, and all that; but you may depend upon it he acted in perfect good faith. Why, he's engaged to be married himself—and to a very charming young girl."

"You mean to Patty Robinson, I suppose," said Mr. Bilfil, smiling sardonically.

"You seem to know all about it," said Markwood.

"Oh, I saw them together on the boat, if you remember, on the day of our regatta."

"To be sure," said Markwood; "I remember now."

"Well, you know, that's all very well," said Mr. Bilfil. "I'm not going to cast stones against my wife; but a man can not lose the tide of his success in life on account of an undutiful wife. My affairs compel me to start for America within a few days. Mrs. Bilfil chooses to keep herself concealed from me. I offered her the shelter of my home; even now I am prepared to come to terms as to her maintenance, if I am convinced that she is living in a regular and proper way. But I can't wait; before I leave this country I must place the matter in the hands of my lawyer to arrange for a legal separation, unless I receive from her a full submission and explanation. Now I want to stand well with you and Mr. Paston. Tell me if I can do otherwise, with justice to myself."

Markwood wrinkled up his face into all kinds of queer puckered lines.

"Tell you what, Bilfil," he cried at length. "Wait for a day or two. Leave it in my hands, as a mutual friend: by to-morrow evening you shall know all about it. You may safely trust me with your interests; and if I should be the means of bringing two estimable people together again—"

Mr. Bilfil shook his head. "I don't see much chance of that," he said. "However, I'll leave the matter in your hands. You will ascertain, at all events, the basis on which we can treat; and, if negotiations fail, you can testify which side is to blame."

Markwood, who delighted in the skillful conduct of a negotiation, shook Bilfil warmly by the hand, and presently they separated—Markwood making his way into the City to take initiatory steps in the matter.

In the first place, he had to find out Mrs. Bilfil. The most direct way would have been to go to Edward Hulse, and ask him; but this was hardly diplomatic enough for Markwood. Edward would probably feel himself bound in honor to refuse to disclose the lady's retreat. But in all probability he had confided the matter to Patty Robinson. To the Robinsons' house he would go; and if he failed to extract the secret from the women-folk there—why, then his tongue had lost its cunning.

Under favorable aspects Trinity Square is not an uncheerful neighborhood. In the centre is a green inclosure, with trees and shrubs, among which children disport themselves, and the houses roundabout are of comfortable build and proportions. True, indeed, that the advancing tide of trade has encroached upon the living interest of the place, and that tall desks, and heavy ledgers with massive bindings, and smart young clerks and bearded merchants, have usurped the place of human families. But the general aspect is unchanged; it is in appearance a comfortable, old-fashioned residential square, with certain peculiar features of interest about it. On the higher side of the square is a classic temple dedicated to Neptune, served by certain priests known as Elder Brethren—the Trinity House, indeed. Over the way is a square official-looking building, severe in its simplicity—known, by a huge brass plate on its portals, as the Inland Revenue Office; and beyond that, embayed by a promontory of public-houses, is Tower Dock—a dry dock now, indeed; a paved square space where fisher carts and vans await the flood of Billingsgate. Then there is the Tower, the white fort on London Pool; hoary with memories, but, sooth to say, less venerable in aspect than many a younger fortress.

Markwood cast a recognizing glance around, for he was not unacquainted with these latitudes. He knew a salesman or two in Billingsgate, and often, in the fine summer mornings, had made purveying forages among the rude denizens of the market, carrying off surprising bargains in huge cod, lordly salmon, and aldermanic turbot. Then he was hand-and-glove with two or three Beef-eaters at the Tower, was on speaking terms with a venerable Elder Brother, and on nodding terms with all his pretty Semitic younger sisters in Houndsditch. Altogether, Markwood could have lounged away an hour or two very pleasantly in the neighborhood; but he was now intent on business, and made his way to a corner house of red brick, in whose windows was a notification, "Apartments to let," while a plate on the door bore the name of Robinson.

"How do you do, ma'am?" he said, politely, as a thin, elderly female opened the door to his ring and knock. "How do you do, ma'am?—and how's Miss Patty? And Robinson—is he pretty well?"

Mrs. Robinson acknowledged that there was no serious illness in the house; but she looked doubtfully on Mr. Markwood, and didn't ask him to enter.

"I should like a few words with you, ma'am. Our mutual friend, Mr. Edward Hulse—capital fellow, Ned; I know all about it, you see!"

"Oh, if you come from him, step in."

"I can hardly say I come from him," said Markwood, establishing himself in the hall, taking off his gloves, putting them inside his hat, and hanging that up in a peculiar confident way. "If he'd known I was coming, he'd have sent all kinds of messages, I've no doubt. But he didn't; for, to tell you the truth, I wouldn't let him know—for in matters of this kind things are often better done by third parties—friends of every body concerned, aren't they, Mrs. Robinson?"

Markwood, it is needless to say, was sparring for wind—trying to keep Mrs. Robinson's mind engaged while he established a footing in her good opinion. The lady of the house coughed doubtfully, and said that she thought there were a good many things wanted explaining and putting to rights.

"So there are," said Markwood; "and first and foremost about Mrs.—eh? You understand."

"Come into my parlor, Sir," said Mrs. Robinson, "which is disengaged at this present moment." She led the way into a room on the ground-floor, with faded carpet and hangings, and old-fashioned mahogany furniture. "You mean about Mrs. Balfour, I suppose?"

"Balfour—yes, of course," said Markwood, eagerly. "I know it's a matter that may seem strange to you, and I want to put it right."

"Well, Sir, I won't say but what it's an object with me to let my first floor, as has been empty a good while; and, what with rents and rates and taxes, there's little profit, I assure you, Mr. Markwood, in lodgers. But it's worse when you haven't got 'em. Still I wasn't best pleased when Ed'ard brought her here; no more Patty wasn't neither, when she came to hear of it, as was at Margate when the lady came."

"I assure you, madam, there isn't the slightest cause for any uneasiness. Ned Hulse is a lad who is as true as steel; the lady's a near relation, and in peculiar circumstances; therefore Ned has taken her part. Now here I am representing every body—uncles and husbands, and Ned Hulse, and you too, ma'am, and Miss Patty. I'm here to make arrangements that will prove satisfactory to every body. But I must see Mrs.—you know, eh? Is she at home?"

Mrs. Balfour was at home, and there would be no difficulty in Mr. Markwood's seeing her. Mrs. Robinson would take her his card.

Markwood rubbed his hands with delight at the prospect of accomplishing his mission so speedily and well. He felicitated himself, too, on his skillful diplomatic manœuvres; although, in truth, fortune had aided him very much in the matter.

Margaret Bilfil sat at her second-floor window listlessly watching the coming on of night, the gradual shrouding and wrapping up of the living world about her, the wilderness of houses fading away into a lurid haze, a white mist from the Surrey marshes blotting out the tracery of spars and rigging and masts, the white turrets of the keep of the gloomy stronghold alone rising into distinctness. She watched the gradual approach of the all-encompassing gloom in a nervous agitation that was almost terror. She felt so lost and lonely in the centre of this huge city. How narrow was the interval between her and a state of absolute want, destitution, and starvation! For the moment she had a roof to shelter her, but how insecure her tenure even of this! She saw from the way in which she was treated by Mrs. Robinson how insecure her position, in what way people would regard her, what sneers she would encounter, what innuendoes, what polite or impolite cold-shouldering. If those who submitted themselves in all things to the dictates of society, and studied only to accommodate themselves to its humors, could barely assert for themselves the right to live, what chance was there for her, who had set at naught one of its most fundamental canons? Edward, too, seemed to be deserting her. She had received a hurried note from him that night. He was going out of town, he said, and unfortunately could not advance her any money on her uncle's account, as he had a sudden call upon all his available means; but he recommended her to apply to Mr. Markwood, her uncle's confidential clerk and agent, who would no doubt supply her wants.

But how could she go to her uncle's clerk and enter into these humiliating details! And even if she could convince him she was not a swindler, how could she ask him to advance moneys that might never be repaid! For her uncle Tom was as hard as adamant on some points. If he thought her to blame in leaving her husband—as she was pretty sure that he would—he would inexorably close his heart and his purse-strings against her. Altogether her prospects seemed so dark and hopeless that she abandoned herself to despair; and turning away from the window, into which the lamps of the street were beginning faintly to shine, she threw herself upon a squat and slippery horse-hair couch, and embracing a cold, hard cylinder, that was by courtesy a cushion, she sobbed aloud in the bitterness of her spirit.

At this moment Mrs. Robinson knocked at the door, and opening it immediately afterward, announced a visitor for Mrs. Balfour, a Mr. Markwood.

Margaret eagerly rose. She was thankful for the darkness that concealed the traces of her tears. At a bound she passed from despair to hope; she was not entirely forsaken and abandoned—he must be a good angel, this Mr. Markwood.

"Show him up, please, Mrs. Robinson," she said; "and bring me candles also."

Markwood, who had a good deal of chivalry in his nature, was touched at the sight of Margaret's beauty and evident distress. His heart warmed to her, and he forgot all about his diplomacy, his position as mutual friend and adviser. From that moment he became an unscrupulous partisan.

"I have heard of you, Mr. Markwood," said Margaret, giving him a comely white hand; "you seem to be a friend, although I don't know that I have ever seen you before."

"Bless you, my dear," said Markwood, his eyes quite moist with emotion, "if there's any thing a devoted friend can do for you, you may count upon me as the man."

The contagion of sympathy overpowered Margaret also.

"I know you are good, Mr. Markwood," she cried; "I can see it in your face; and indeed I stand in need of a friend, for I have none, and I don't know what to do."

Then she told him all her story, and asked him for his advice.

"Well, madam," he said, "I came here to offer you certain terms on Mr. Bilfil's behalf, but I won't even tell you what they are. I can't advise you to return to him. Wait, I advise you, till your uncle comes back. I'll take care that he shall know the real state of the case; and in the mean time, ma'am, you will confer a personal obligation on me if you will honor me by accepting a loan sufficient to carry you on with comfort."

"You are very kind," cried Margaret. "Why should you take all this care for me?"

"Because, ma'am, it's my duty. Don't talk of obligation, ma'am; I'm only too proud to have the chance of serving Mr. Paston's niece."

"But, after all, if he doesn't approve of what you've done—if he casts me off, and he may do—"

"I'll cast him off if he does, ma'am," said Markwood, indignantly. "No, no, ma'am; don't make yourself uneasy."

"But I am uneasy; and at the best it galls me to think of being dependent upon his breath for my living. Now can't you, Mr. Markwood, suggest to me some way in which I can make a living for myself?"

Mr. Markwood puckered up his face and thought for a while. "Well, ma'am," he said at last, "I should be deceiving you if I told you there wasn't a difficulty. You see, the first thing that's asked when you want a situation is—what are your references, what similar places have you had, and so on."

"Well," said Margaret, "I used to teach before I married. I could refer to those people who employed me before."

"They knew about your marriage, I suppose, ma'am?"

"Yes; I think they all did."

"Then don't you think they'll be sure to mention it? And then you'd be asked if you were a widow, and so on. And, excuse me, madam, but when it was found you were separated from your husband, you'd find a difficulty."

"But there must be a way out of it."

"One way has occurred to me, ma'am," said Markwood. "And although it isn't what you might look for fairly, yet, perhaps, it's better than nothing. I'm a widower, ma'am, with a family of young children; I do the best I can with them, but they're almost too much for me—the girls especially. Now I am not in very ample means, ma'am, but still I have a comfortable house, and enough to keep the pot boiling. I have been thinking for some time that I really must have an experienced governess to keep the lasses in order, and to give 'em lady-like manners, and so on."

"And you were thinking of me? Indeed you are too good. If I am only fitted for it, I shall be so happy. I sha'n't want much salary, Mr. Markwood—enough to buy clothes and gloves and pay my laundress. Oh, do you really think I shall do?"

Mr. Markwood enthusiastically declared that he was sure of it. Thus, as both parties were mutually inclined to the arrangement, there was little difficulty in settling the preliminaries; only, as Markwood was now in lodgings at Henley, and had let his house furnished to the end of the month, the assumption by Mrs. Bilfil of her duties must be put off for a few weeks.

Then Margaret mentioned to Markwood the five hundred pounds which her uncle had left her, the interest of which would form such a comfortable addition to her income. There was no settlement made at her marriage, and Markwood feared that this sum was at her husband's disposal, and that he might do what he liked with it. "But perhaps," suggested Markwood, "I may shame him into giving it up. I'll go on to his office from here, and speak to him at once about it."

When Markwook reached Mr. Bilfil's office he found it closed for the night. He made friends, however, with the housekeeper, and persuaded her to let him write a note in Mr. Bilfil's private room, which he still continued to occupy, although he had ceased to have an interest in the business. When he had finished his note, he happened to see a slip of paper lying open on the desk above him. The name of Hulse caught his eye, and he read it almost involuntarily.

"Mem.—We've got a warrant ne exeat against Edward Hulse, and propose to make our capture to-night."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

ALL eyes have been turned toward Cuba—a sunny isle, the largest of the West India group, some 650 miles long, and its greatest width 107 miles. Lying just within the tropics, its climate is perpetual summer, tempered by cooling sea-breezes. There is one record of snow having fallen in a central town of Cuba in 1856, and hail is not unfrequent; but while the heat is rarely oppressive, the thermometer seldom falls below 60°, except occasionally in the interior. Havana is a special resort for invalids. This important commercial city has outgrown its original walls; but for its defense, and that of its harbor, there are half a dozen forts and a citadel. The long and narrow channel which leads to the city is defended on the east side by the great castle El Morro, and on the west by the powerful fortress La Punta. La Cabaña is said to be the largest and strongest of all the defensive works of Havana, requiring in time of war a garrison of 2000 men. In 1762 Havana, after a siege of forty-four days, fell into the hands of the English; but the next year it was restored to Spain in accordance with certain arrangements made by treaty. Havana is regularly laid out, and though its streets are narrow, many of them are well paved with granite. It is well lighted with gas, and supplied with water by an aqueduct. The city also has its public promenades, its fountains, its universities, libraries, and museums, and there are numerous daily, weekly, and monthly publications. Havana, to a greater degree than any other Spanish city, has adopted the mechanical appliances of industry and the various improvements which have been brought to it through its commercial relations with other nations.

There has been much discussion concerning the previous history of the Virginius, which was recently captured by the Spanish gun-boat Tornado. So far as can be gathered from statements made, it appears that she was an English-built vessel, but was captured by our government in 1865 while lying in the harbor at Mobile. After being tried and condemned by existing law, she was used by the government about a year, when she was sold to private parties, being known both at the time of capture and sale as the Virgin. In 1867 she was again taken by the government as the property of a defaulting Treasury officer. Being found unsuitable for the revenue marine service, she was offered for sale, and was finally sold in 1870 from the Navy-yard in Washington. She was then taken to New York, and a register as the Virginius was granted. The Virginius sailed from Kingston, Jamaica, on the 23d of last October, and a few days later attempted to land at Cuba, but was driven away by Spanish vessels. On October 31 she was pursued by the Tornado, and finally captured in what is averred to be neutral waters. She was taken to Santiago de Cuba; the captives, after a hasty trial, were condemned as pirates; many of them were summarily executed, and others consigned to ignominious punishment.

The earliest skating day at the Central Park since it was opened was December 11, 1863. It is now the expectation that the large building which is being erected on the margin of the lower lake, near the Terrace, will be ready for use by the 10th of December. It has been in position several winters, but is so constructed that it can be taken apart and stored during the summer. This building contains a restaurant, several rooms, and a large hall for the use of skaters, all being well warmed. The upper story is designed especially for the accommodation of ladies who frequent the ice. It costs about five thousand dollars every year to erect this building and remove it, as repairs are always needed.

Salmon lovers will be interested in the following communication:

"UNITED STATES COMMISSION FISH AND FISHERIES,
WASHINGTON, November 11, 1873.

"Editor 'Forest and Stream':

"I am perfectly willing to place a good lot of Sacramento salmon in the Hudson River. Seth Green has 250,000, and I will tell him to so dispose of a portion.

"Very truly yours,
"SPENCER W. BAIRD, Commissioner."

Several of the best Spanish iron-clads are now in the hands of the Intransigentes at Cartagena. Before these could be used against any foreign power Spain must necessarily so reconcile this disorderly home element as to gain possession of the vessels.

Terrible suffering is reported from Iowa from lack of food and clothing among the settlers in the northwestern sections. The harvest was a failure this year, chiefly in consequence of a plague of grasshoppers. An earnest appeal for relief is made.

The unfortunate Cardiff Giant was lately sold at New Orleans. The auctioneer intimated that $10,000 would be the correct figure for this relic, but was finally forced to let it go for eight dollars. The poor fellow who bought it spent eighteen dollars in trying to move it, and then gave up in disgust, and surrendered his right and title to a Jewish junk dealer.

The prison where the Virginius captives were confined is described as a low gloomy building, two stories in height; and the place of their execution was distant from it about three-quarters of a mile. It is a structure of forbidding aspect, standing on an eminence which may be seen from every part of the city. The building is scarred and battered with bullets on its northern side. Around it runs a trench about two feet deep, into which the water from the roof falls. When prisoners are to be executed they are led to the edge of the trench, bound hand and foot, and required to kneel with faces toward the wall. When, at a given signal, the soldiers fire upon them, the unfortunate victims fall forward into the trench, and then, not unfrequently, the heavy artillery carriages are driven over the bodies.

During the civil war 7000 men were employed in the Brooklyn Navy-yard; about 3500 have been recently engaged with special vigor in repairing and fitting up our vessels of war. Our government has no intention of being unprepared for any emergency. Business is going on in every navy-yard.

Santiago de Cuba was formerly the capital of Cuba, and is now perhaps the second city in commercial importance. It is a well-built city, but in consequence of its peculiar location is not regarded as healthy.

At Ahmedabad, India, there is a "Society for the Prevention of Infant Marriages." A recent number of the Sumsher Bahadoor publishes some by-laws for the regulation of business. One meeting will be held every month for discussion. Members are not required to pay any fixed installments, but donations voluntarily given will be thankfully accepted. Members will be required to observe the following rules: "The bridegroom should be at least sixteen years old, and the bride at least five years younger. Members will have to register at the office at what age of the bride and bridegroom the marriage took place." Other branch societies are to be started in other places.

Kentucky is a remarkable State, and the dwellers therein possess wonderful vitality. A "credible witness" relates that not long ago an old woman died in the vicinity of Ramsey. She was in life eccentric, and, among other peculiarities, disliked flowers, and had forbidden that any be used at her funeral. Unfortunately a young lady who was present at the funeral was ignorant of this prohibition, and placed a wreath on her coffin, when the dead suddenly arose, seized the chaplet, and threw it at the offender! She then lay down in the coffin again. Such is the tale, illustrating the "ruling passion strong in death."

It is related of Alexandre Dumas, that when at the San Carlo Theatre, in Naples, one evening, he entered into conversation with a stranger seated near him. At the close of the performance the stranger said, "I hope that we may have the pleasure of meeting again. I am Alexandre Dumas."

"Oh, indeed!" replied the celebrated novelist, with his gay laugh; "so am I."

The stranger collapsed.

During the trial of Marshal Bazaine, his wife, though deeply affected by the dreadful suspense, did not lose courage. She considered her husband entirely innocent, and kept up his spirits by hopes of an honorable acquittal. Her faith in his innocence, and her cheerful demeanor when in his company, greatly encouraged the marshal. Madame Bazaine is about twenty-five years of age, and a Mexican by birth. She has been residing in a very retired way at Versailles with her two children.

Constancy is a virtue belonging more often to woman than to man. A young woman of Cornwall, England, traveled all the way to California to marry the lover she had not seen for eight years. But she found him not only married, but the father of five children.

Lewiston, thirty miles from Portland, is the largest cotton-manufacturing town in Maine, and the water-power there is the finest in the State. The city contains about 20,000 inhabitants, and the working force in the factories is not far from 7500. A large amount of capital is invested in the Lewiston mills, and they are chiefly owned by wealthy Boston men. The staple domestic fabrics are mostly manufactured there, the demand for which is more constant than for fancy fabrics and dress goods. There are in Lewiston eighteen manufacturing corporations, ten cotton mills, running 250,000 spindles, and five woolen mills, with twenty sets of woolen machinery. Thirty-five thousand bales of cotton are annually consumed. There are annually produced thirty-five millions of yards of cotton and woolen goods, and three millions of grain bags. The annual value of the manufactured product of the city is $11,000,000.

The trial of Marshal Bazaine was held in the Grand Trianon at Versailles, a mansion connected memorably with the vicissitudes of many French sovereigns. The gallery in which the trial was held forms the entrance hall to the Grand Trianon. It is a long hall, about two hundred feet in length and fifty feet wide, lighted by windows opening on the court-yard to the east and on to the garden to the west. It is entered by folding-doors at the southern side. All along each side of the hall there is a double row of columns of colored marble. This colonnade makes the width of the hall appear less than it really is. Marshal Bazaine has been the recipient of numerous honors. He entered the army as a private soldier in 1831, and received many promotions, until he was made Marshal of France, in Mexico, in 1864. He has been fourteen times mentioned in General Orders with praise. In addition to the Grand Order of the Legion of Honor, to which he rose by regular degrees, he has at various times received the Grand Military Lion of Savoy, the Grand Cross of the Order of Leopold of Belgium, the Grand Cross of the Sun of Persia, the Grand Cross of the Order of the Eagle of Mexico, the Grand Cross of the Order of Notre Dame de Guadeloupe. He is a Knight Commander ot the Bath, a Knight of the Order of Charles III., a Knight of St. Ferdinand of Spain, a Knight of the Order of Isabella the Catholic of Spain, and has also the military medal in France. As colonel, general of brigade, general of division, and marshal, he has held eighteen independent commands, and has

CASHMERE HOOD.

Cashmere Hood.

THIS hood is made of white cashmere, and is lined with blue silk. The trimming consists of puffs and ruches of the material, and bows of blue gros grain ribbon. Strings of similar ribbon.

Silk and Tulle Hood.

THIS hood of red silk is thinly wadded, and lined with lustring, and is covered on the outside with black dotted tulle. The trimming consists of a puff of silk and tulle, ruches and bows of red silk ribbon, and black lace. On the left side is a flower.

Gentleman's Shooting Suit, Figs. 1 and 2.

THE trowsers, leggings, and coat are of gray corduroy. The leggings are closed with buttons and button-holes. Black leather belt. Game-bag and gun-sling of leather covered with gray linen; the latter is embroidered. The illustrations, Figs. 1–3, page 804, show the game-bag and the design for the gun-sling (see the accompanying descriptions).

IVAN THE TERRIBLE.

IVAN VASSEILOVITCH, or John the son of Basil, known, perhaps, more familiarly to us as Ivan the Terrible, was a man of noble person and presence, with a sharp, shrill voice, high forehead, piercing eye, restless, inquisitive manner. He was shrewd and acute in intellect, and not without generous, noble impulses, but of wild, untamed passions, and brutalized by the manners of his court and time. The court of Moscow was little more civilized and refined than the tents of a Tartar horde. Deep drinking was the great pastime and only relaxation of the Czar and his nobles. Ivan himself after his mid-day meal would drink himself into a stupor, fall asleep with his head upon the table, his courtiers watching him with nervous apprehension. Presently he awakes; perhaps he is in a good humor, and laughs and jokes with his complaisant companions; perhaps he turns his blood-shot eyes upon some suspected favorite, and orders him out for examination and question: impalement to follow, possibly, or horrid torture of some sort.

And yet in his youth this Ivan had been a prince of most fair promise, and had indeed accomplished great things. He had been married at an early age to a most exemplary wife, Anastatia, a daughter of the great house of Romanoff. This most excellent princess, while encouraging the development of his nobler nature, restrained by her influence the promptings of his lower inclinations—a most noble example to princesses of all sorts; but unhappily she died in 1560. Her husband was yet young, but he had cast off the yoke of the Tartars, conquered their cities of Kasan and Astrakhan, and made the Volga from source to mouth a Russian stream—truly an excellent beginning.

Bad times follow for the Muscovites: losses and defeats, great massacres by their mad, furious monarch; great slaughter, too, at the hands of their enemies the Tartars. Yearly, and sometimes twice a year, they are overrun by fierce Tartar hordes. In 1571 the Khan of the Crimea sweeps the country with an army of two hundred thousand horsemen. Ivan essays to meet him, but his army is mutinous, and refuses to fight. The Russ emperor abandons his capital to its fate, and flies with his treasures and body-guard to a fortified monastery sixty miles away. The enemy encamp around Moscow, powerless for a regular siege, but saying sundry Scythian devices in the incendiary way. These succeed at last. The enemy fires the high steeple of St. John's Church, and, a wonderful stormy wind then blowing, the whole city is soon wrapped in flames. This city of Moscow was then a huge cluster of wooden booths; the streets were paved with wooden planks, all pine wood, full of turpentine, and ready for a blaze; the roofs were mostly of bark. The whole city quickly becomes one glowing incandescent mass. The people fly from the cruel flames to the crueler Tartars outside; the gates are choked with the fugitives; the moats, the water-courses, stopped and filled up with bodies. Countless thousands perish by fire, by suffocation, by drowning, by the swords of the Tartars. These plunder the fugitives, make slaves of the choicest of them, and ride away rejoicing to their own country, laden with booty.

After this the Khan sends an embassade to his enemy Ivan, "a most ugly creature without reverence," to taunt and flout him, and offer him a rusty knife to cut his throat withal. Ivan rages, tears his hair and beard from madness; has almost a mind to follow his enemy's counsel. But presently recovering, he sets to work, dissolves his army, that fought not a stroke for him, questions his chief men and captains how such a disgrace came to pass, puts some to the torture, some to death. Then he makes haste to replenish, cleanse, and repair his burned capital; drives into it merchants and craftsmen from other cities and towns, gives them free markets, and relieves them from all taxes. Seven thousand masons and workmen are building up a fine strong wall round about the city. But Ivan himself trusts not his person there. He dreads his own subjects and every one about him, and he draws off to Vologda on the Dwina, for he has a purpose in his head that, if all else fail him, he will take refuge in England with his treasures. So he collects a flotilla there, and stores all his best things in the island of Solovetzkoï, in the White Sea, ready to sail away.

About this time he consorted much with one Dr. Eliseus Bomel, a Westphalian, but educated in England, at Cambridge. He became a physician in England, and also an astrologer. For suspicion of some unholy practices he was put in prison by Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, but was liberated on his promise to take himself away to the Czar of Muscovy. Ivan loved necromancy, and made much of the doctor, who rose highly in his favor. Bomel suggests to Ivan that he should become a suitor to Elizabeth, the great Queen of England. Ivan sees difficulties at first: he has two wives living, and many kings and great princes have been suitors to her, and could not prevail. But he calls to mind his own prowess with the fair sex, plumes himself upon his wisdom, greatness, and riches, and is so far embarked upon the business that he puts the empress, his latest consort, into a nunnery. Still the design does not develop itself. Ivan now has a wonderful device in his head, by which he hopes to restore his popularity and replenish his treasury. He formally resigns his crown to a Tartar khan, who has been baptized under the name of Simeon. He sets on the new king to cancel all letters patent, privileges, franchises, to resume all the charters of towns and monasteries. At this there is much terror and confusion every where. "The old Czar was not so bad, after all," is the universal cry. "Let him come back to us." The cunning Ivan graciously complies; the puppet king fades into oblivion. There are great gifts to be furnished by every body on the Czar's gracious re-accession. He renews and confirms all charters and privileges—for a consideration.

SILK AND TULLE HOOD.

FIG. 2.—GENTLEMAN'S SHOOTING SUIT.—BACK.

Unfortunate Bomel now fell under the tyrant's suspicion. He had been corresponding with the kings of Poland and Sweden. It seems, too, that he had deceived the emperor about the age of Elizabeth, having represented her as a young woman, whereas she was already over forty—there being then no Almanach de Gotha for authoritative reference. Anyhow, Bomel was doomed. He was tortured—roasted alive, with inconceivable horrors. Horsey, an Englishman, who relates the story, was an eye-witness. "I preste among many others," he says, "to see him: caste up his eyes naminge Christe, cast into a dungion and died there."

Ivan, however, long hungered after an English wife. He learned from an English physician, one Dr. Jacobs, that a kinswoman of the queen, Lady Mary Hastings, was of marriageable age and fair presence. Then, in 1582, he dispatches an envoy to England to open to Elizabeth his project of an alliance, and to demand an interview with the lady, and obtain her portrait. He was, moreover, to inquire as to her age, her degree of relationship to the queen, her father's rank, and other matters.

In case the queen objected that the Czar was already married, he might own the fact, but allege that the empress was no king's daughter or princess, that he did not like her, and meant to put her away. That he had already had six wives could hardly have been thrown in his teeth with any propriety by the daughter of the eighth Harry.

On the other hand, his bride would be required to embrace the Greek faith; the Czarowitz would not be deprived of his rights to the succession, but her possible male issue would be suitably provided for.

The Muscovite embassador was received with much distinction; but Elizabeth was not favorably affected to marriages in general, and threw cold water on the project. She depreciated the proposed bride as ill-favored: she had only lately recovered from small-pox, she was no subject for the limner's art. The envoy, however, persevered, although some discredit was cast upon his suit by the news that came from Russia, that the reigning empress had just been confined of a son—the unfortunate Demetrius, who was assassinated in the following reign. The embassador refused to credit the news, and persisted in demanding an interview with Lady Mary, which was at last granted.

The meeting was arranged to take place in a wide tent in the garden of York House, in the daytime, in order that the envoy might judge of her complexion in the full glare of daylight.

The interview is thus described by Horsey: "Her Majesty caused that lady (Mary Hastings) to be atended one, with divers great ladies and maieds of honnor and yonge noblemen, the nomber of each apointed, to be seen by the said ambassodor in Yorcke House garden. She put one a staetly countenance accordinglie. The ambassodor, attended with divers other noblemen and others, was brought before her Ladyship; cast down his countenance, fell prostrate to her feet, rise, runne backe from her, his face still towards her, she and the rest admiringe at his manner, said by an interpritor, yt did suffice him to behold the angell he hoped should be his master's espouse; commended her angellicall countenance, state, and admirable beauty. She after was called by her familliar frends in court the Emporis of Muscovia."

Lady Mary Hastings, however, appears to have been frightened at the character of her proposed husband, and she finally declined the alliance.

Ivan, however, is soon called to the embrace of another and less attractive bride. He falls sick, not without suspicion of poison. He sends for witches from the north: sixty of them come, but their divinations afford him no solace. A great blazing star is seen every night over the city of Moscow; every thing betokens the death of the great Czar. Every day he is carried into his treasury to gloat over the riches he has accumulated, perhaps in hope to win some strength from his jewels. He covers his arm and hand with corals and turquoises; they show their virtue by paling upon his poisoned veins. His staff royal is brought out—the horn of a rhinoceros loaded with gems, of great virtue against poisons. It is of no avail to him. The ruby, most comfortable to the heart, brain, and vigor of man, has no restorative power for the Czar. His beloved sapphires, preserving and increasing courage, and full of sovereign virtues, can do him no good. He faints among his treasures, and is carried away. But he revives again, lives on to the day fixed by the witches and warlocks for his last. He is yet heart-whole; Ivan is himself again. He threatens to burn his soothsayers or bury them alive. "The day has come, indeed, but it is not passed," he is reminded, like that greater Cæsar. Well, let them burn after sundown. He goes to his bath, and stays there three or four hours. He comes out refreshed, and challenges one of his gentlemen to chess. With his own hands he sets out the board—all but the king, whom he can not make stand in his place. Then he faints and falls backward. A great outcry and stir; and while the palace resounds with the tramp of hurrying feet, Ivan lies choked and dead upon the floor.

BARATHEA HOOD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 19 and 20.

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

BRIGHTON.

AS we have got on the subject of wintering-places in England, I must not omit to say a few words about Brighton, that most fashionable of all English sea-places—most fashionable and most expensive when you go there with the crowd who rush down from London to inhale warm sea-breezes toward November, but at other seasons of the year a very commodious and delightful place of residence. Our American friends are of an inquisitive turn of mind, it is said, and like to know the beginning and the end of things. I wish I could tell you something certain about the origin of Brighton, but I believe nobody can. It is generally supposed to descend from a Saxon bishop named Brighthelm, who dwelt there in remote ages, and who eventually gave it his name; but this is one of those legends that you may believe or disbelieve as the fancy suits you. Then there is a story of a colony of Normans having alighted here soon after the Conqueror's arrival in England, and of their being routed away by a colony of Flemings just as they had settled down comfortably in their new quarters. But I don't vouch for this any more than for the Saxon bishop. One thing is certain, that Brighton had not lifted its head out of the wave into public notice at all until the middle of the eighteenth century, and that ever since that time it has gone on growing and flourishing in public favor until, like the beanstalk in the story, "it couldn't grow no higher."—George IV. made it his chief summer residence, and later on the Pavilion arose, and established it, as it was supposed, forevermore as a royal abode. But this was a vain hope. The once royal palace, with its fantastic gathering of domes and minarets and pinnacles, has descended from its former sublime pedestal to the level of an assembly-room, a curiosity, a convenience for givers of balls. As a resource for the latter it stands unrivaled, and perhaps it accounts, in some measure, for the unflagging round of such entertainments that are kept up almost at every season of the year in the town and neighborhood.

Brighton is about fifty miles south of London, and is reached by the express in an hour and some few minutes. This accounts for its being so universal a favorite with men of business, official men, etc., who swarm to its mild shelter in the dreary winter season, running up and down to their work with facility, and snatching between times the refreshing ozone breezes of the "sea without ships." The town stands near the centre of the curved line of coast of which the east and west points are respectively Beachy Head and Selsea Bill. It is built upon a slope, and is sheltered from the ruffian blast of the North by the high land of the South Downs, which, from the east to the central part of Brighton, press close upon the sea and form high chalk cliffs. The sea-frontage occupies a space of about three miles, so there is no lack of sea-views from the houses, the finest of which are situated on the Marine Parade—at least those that are available for visitors. The inner part of the town, which is composed of handsome squares and streets, with fine, sometimes splendid houses, is inhabited by the permanent residents, who do not care to have the great expanse of glistening sea under their windows all the year round, and who seldom let their houses. It may be well to mention, for the benefit of those who suffer from any weakness of the eyes, that Brighton is by no means a suitable place for them. The glare of the sea affects them painfully, and sometimes to such a degree that they are compelled, even at a great sacrifice, to give up their lodgings and leave the town. There are excellent hotels at Brighton, and a large number of them, capital shops of every description, and, as regards education, its resources are only second to the metropolis. In fact, they need not be called second, for the best masters migrate to the Marine Parade during the season there, and there is an abundant supply of good resident ones. Schools, both for boys and girls, are to be had of the best; some of the finest finishing schools, as they are termed, are at Brighton.

The society is as good as is to be had anywhere, not merely as regards the floating waves of London life borne down by the wind of fashion during winter, but among that large class of refined and exclusive families who have made it their home. There is a saying in England

Fig. 1.—DIAGONAL CLOTH DRESS IN TWO SHADES OF GRAY.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 11-17.

Fig. 2.—DIAGONAL CLOTH DRESS IN TWO SHADES OF GRAY.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 11-17.

Hosted by Google

that when you live at Brighton you are certain to see every body you know once in three years, and it has perhaps more truth in it than the average number of popular sayings. The London doctors believe in Brighton to an extraordinary degree, and send their patients down for a change and a breath of fresh air almost as easily as they order them out for a drive. Yet, with all due respect to the learning of the faculty, the writer makes bold to challenge the universal wisdom of this. I have known more than one instance where the climate acted most disastrously on delicate subjects, or persons with a germ of consumption, for instance. I don't pretend to explain the cause, but I can assure you it is a fact that the soft, south-fanned air of the place does not suit indiscriminately persons with delicate chests. Torquay is the place for them; but I will say a few words on this latter by-and-by.

Epicures will rejoice in the unrivaled South Down mutton, which is to be had nowhere under the sun, so they declare, as good as at Brighton. "It's worth the journey to eat a leg of South Down at Brighton," I remember hearing one of these of the earth earthy mortals exclaim, with indescribable gusto. Let lovers of mutton bear this in mind.

There are churches, of course, in abundance in so fashionable a resort of cultivated Christianity, and baths, and a theatre, where the stars come down at proper seasons and shine in the Brighton firmament; and, for those benevolently inclined, there are ample opportunities in the form of charity-schools, Sunday and common schools; and last, though to many not least, there exists the magnetic attraction of a fine race-course about a mile east of the town, on the summit of the most beautiful part of the Downs.

The town is well fortified, a circumstance worth mentioning for the satisfaction of those nervous persons who, on this side of the Atlantic, live in perpetual terror of an invasion by some foreign foe. There is no vestige of the old fortifications raised by Henry VIII. and Queen Bess, but there is a formidable battery, first erected in 1793, when the roar of the Revolution was sending its echoes across the sea, and rebuilt in 1830.

Brighton possesses one more claim to the preference of American visitors whose steps are bent toward the Continent after a sojourn in the mother country: it is a most convenient starting-point for France. Since the establishment of steamboats and the erection of the chain pier it has become a packet station, and you can go from here to Paris via Dieppe and Rouen, in preference to the more expensive route of Dover and Calais. COMET.

LITTLE ANNETTE.

LITTLE Annette! little Annette!
With your rosy cheeks and tresses of jet;

With the lashes concealing your gypsy eyes,
Meet for a king's or an emperor's prize!

Your white teeth gleaming like drifted snow,
Or shining like pearls in a well-laid row;

Little Annette! little Annette!
I hear the ring of your laughter yet.

Little Annette! darling Annette!
Only a year has flown, and yet,

Ere you could melt the snow with your breath,
A messenger came, and his name was Death!

Little Annette! darling Annette!
Never your face can I forget.

Listen! The angels are calling yet
Over the pine-trees, "Little Annette!"

BABY AND BABY'S NURSE.

HOW closely soever woman may find shut against her certain avenues of human endeavor, she has been left in undisputed possession of one field for the display of her energies. In one department of skill it hath not pleased the lords of creation to compete with the weaker sex. As a nurse, and more particularly the nurse of young infants, woman may act without let or hinderance. Compassion or necessity may, indeed, tempt some tender-hearted man to assume temporarily the functions of nurse, but let a woman approach, and how cheerfully, how gracefully, will the post of duty be resigned to her as hers of right, and as a matter of course!

It is questionable whether any avocation so speedily becomes its own reward as that of nursing a young infant. That nurse must be indeed bereft of every feeling of sentiment who does not feel a little nearer heaven while contemplating the innocence of her young charge, whose very helplessness makes so strong an appeal to the tenderness of her nature. Love seems spontaneously to spring up in the heart of a nurse toward her nursling, and I have heard a humble old negro woman declare that she could never again undertake the office, because it was too painful to her to give up her babies, as she was compelled to do in changing her employers. How instinctive is the prompting to cherish whatever is younger and weaker than ourselves is strikingly demonstrated in the case of children themselves. In a large family with slender means it is beautiful to see with what open-hearted rejoicing a new baby is welcomed. How protectingly and admiringly do the little band hover around the youngest and tenderest of them all! By-the-way, such tender mercies may be cruel, as was witnessed the other day in my friend's family, when, upon occasion of nurse having unwarily turned her back, little Sadie, three years old, was found stuffing her baby sister's mouth with her own dinner, consisting of chicken and rice, wedging it in with a large silver fork. Il n'importe. The prompting love was all the same. With what an air of conscious superiority and benignity Jemmie, who can just totter alone, looks down upon "'ittle sissie" in arms!

And who shall say how mighty are the deeds to spring from these budding germs of benevolence? Let them swell those buds of brotherly kindness, shielded by the fostering care of parental watchfulness! In the after-struggle to come with the selfishness of the world memories of the disinterested affection poured forth to bless our childhood will invest us with a panoply of faith in the charities of our race strong enough to withstand many an onset of temptation urging us not to believe in any good.

The attractiveness of the theme has beguiled us into generalities, when we meant to confine ourselves to a few specific directions for the treatment of new-born babies.

The very first charge to give a nurse is to remember that, small though the little creatures are, they still must breathe. Do not cover the baby's face, as is yet the manner of some nurses. Accustom a child from the first to inhale fresh air, taking the precaution to protect the top and back of the head, so as to be shielded from exposure to draughts of air. So simple a direction may seem trivial, but the following occurrence, happening under the writer's own observation, proves that it may not be wholly superfluous. Two uncommonly intelligent ladies, calling upon the mother of an infant two weeks old, expressed a wish to see the child. The mother, being called away, left them, and when she returned to the bedside found that the ladies had drawn the blankets so closely that in a few more minutes there would have been no further need for care: the little creature was well-nigh smothered.

Careful tenderness is the next requisite for a nurse to possess. Gentleness may be cultivated. The mere rough handling of a baby's feeble frame may cause discomfort amounting to pain. Be gentle in touch, if you would nurse successfully. Have you never seen a crying child soothed and hushed by a mere transfer from the arms of one person to those of another more gentle and motherly?

Remember to keep the baby warm. Colic, that scourge of the first month of babyhood, may be in great measure warded off by simply observing to maintain the baby's body at proper temperature. Especially guard the feet from cold. A baby kept always dry and warm will seldom be troubled with colic.

Washing and dressing baby is the important event of the day to a young mother, and no trifling duty is it to perform. Let the nurse choose an hour when she may uninterruptedly go through her task, a place where her charge shall not be exposed to cold. Use tepid water, so as to occasion no shock to the child, and submerge the whole body as soon as the navel is perfectly healed. Let the process be as rapid as is consistent with thoroughness, and rub well with a soft towel until reaction is produced. Every piece of clothing, after being well aired and warmed, should be arranged in its proper order and hung near by, so as to be put on without delay or running about from place to place with the naked child in one's arms (as is often done) to procure essentials that should all have been provided beforehand. Dip a clean linen rag in water before proceeding to do the rest of the washing, and wipe off thoroughly the coating of curdled milk adhering to the tongue, gums, and roof of the mouth. By a daily attention to this direction all danger of thrush is removed.

Secure the clothes firmly, but by inserting two fingers between the flannel band and child's body, as you are pinning it on, make sure of not fastening it too tightly. Use as few pins as possible, but let the few that are indispensable be large: they are less apt to slip and stick in the child.

Do not feed a baby every time it cries, but aim to have regular hours for giving it nourishment. Three hours is a good interval to allow between the meals, but be certain that the supply is adequate to the infant's wants at those times. Underfed children will be fretful; overfed children will be sickly. No directions, however explicit, can supply the lack of constant, unremitting watchfulness on the part of a nurse. Mother-love fortunately does not often need a reminder, yet even such love can not always take the place of experience. She, then, is not a wise mother who does not gladly avail herself of hints meant to aid her in the discharge of her important if lowly task of striving in the first days of infancy to lay those foundations of vigorous, robust health that are the best mere earthly blessing that can be bequeathed to man.

USEFUL RECIPES.

RICH WEDDING FRUIT CAKE.—To one pound of flour, put ten eggs, a pound of sugar, a pound of butter, two pounds of raisins, one pound of currants, three-quarters of a pound of citron, three-quarters of a pound of blanched almonds cut up, a large nutmeg, a dessert-spoonful of pounded mace, and a gill of French brandy or wine. To produce the rich dark color so much admired in this kind of cake use brown sugar, but especially brown the flour. Attend to preparing with nicety each fruit separately. Beat whites and yolks of eggs very light, and separately. Flour the fruits, and lastly, bake in a steady slow oven, and the recipe can not fail.

ITALIAN CAKE.—Into two tea-cupfuls of sifted flour stir in well one tea-spoonful of cream of tartar; beat with the yolks of five eggs until perfectly light two tea-cupfuls of sand sugar; then add slowly the grated rind and juice of one large lemon, and lightly beat in the stiffly beaten whites of four eggs. In five table-spoonfuls of cold water mix well half a tea-spoonful of soda, and add just as the cake goes into the oven. Bake in two tins exactly of a size, with upright sides, "brick shape." Beat as ordinary icing (allowing ten tea-spoonfuls of flour sugar to the white of one egg) the whites of two eggs; when stiff enough, stir in the rind of one and juice of two oranges, and spread between the cakes.

Stiff brown paper should always be kept around cake to exclude the air. The same piece of paper can be used a long time, and it is better than each time procuring a fresh piece, as a piece used once or twice becomes greasy, and does not absorb any more from the cake. Wrap the cake well in the paper before putting it in the cake-box.

In using porcelain kettles, when fruit, etc., sticks to the bottom, put in warm ashes, and cover with cold water; let it remain a few minutes, pour off, and wash; if not clean the first time, soak again, and longer.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Pay of Lawyers and Painters.—Making Eyes.—After the Ball.—A dismal Dinner-Party.

THE luck of the Whigs in the distribution of patronage is proverbial, but so many bishoprics and high legal offices it has probably never been any minister's lot to give away as have chanced to Mr. Gladstone. The Lord Chief Justiceship of the Common Pleas and a Vice-Chancellorship—the pay of the one being seven thousand pounds a year, and that of the other five thousand—have "fallen in" this week. The Attorney-General, "silver-tongued" Coleridge, has decided to accept the former post, but not without considerable hesitation, which suggests what sums per annum lawyers must needs make in this happy land! The Attorney-Generalship (which is not, however, a permanency, its possessor going out with the ministry) was computed lately at £8000,* and yet that officer is allowed to practice on his private account; unless that latter point was conceded, it was urged that no barrister with a good business would be induced to take the £8000! And yet if a good author, such as Dickens, makes his £8000 a year, the hands of even his admirers are held up at so magnificent a success—an astonishment which, since there are not two Dickenses, seems rather anomalous.

Painters are better paid than authors, the reason of this being that the wealth of England, though very great, is in few hands, and there are no means by which a rich man can exhibit his riches so obviously as by buying pictures; moreover, since this personal wealth is ever increasing, the buying of pictures, no matter at how extravagant a price, is in the end a good investment. For instance, the purchaser of Millais's "Chill October," the late Mr. Benyon, who gave, I believe, £3000 for it, may be said to have lost £150 a year by its possession; but it might be sold to-morrow for £5000. For the unsold pictures of Sir Edwin Landseer—or, in other words, for the sweepings of his studio—an eminent picture dealer has just offered £50,000.

At the rear of the late Duke of Bedford's house, in Kensington, built for a "beloved object," whose untimely death, it is said, hastened that of his grace, Mr. Millais is now building a mansion for himself, for the mere ground of which that fortunate artist has given seven thousand pounds. Compared with such rewards as these, how scanty are the gains of the poor authors! How moderate—I will not say inadequate—are the few thousand pounds a year that even the best of writers receives for his gossip!

There are, however, even worse trades than literature—at all events, in Paris. At the famous artificial eye manufactory in that city—where four hundred eyes are made per week, besides the enormous quantity of eyes that the fair Parisians make at their victims—there is a gentleman kept in the show-room for this queer purpose: he has but one eye himself, and in the socket of the other it is his mission to place eyes—brown, blue, and black—in order that intending purchasers may judge of the general effect! I would just as soon be an author (if not sooner), and have my book criticised by the Saturday Review, as undertake such employment. I am told that even "wicked eyes" are sold that wink at the approach of beauty, but this may be an exaggeration; the artificiality, however, of none of these eyes can be detected, unless a fly happens to settle upon it, and a certain insect-deterrent polish is employed to avert this catastrophe.

Ever since the publication of those dreadful articles on the "girl of the period" a stream of scandal has set in against the husband-hunters. This is the latest and worst: A young lady who had set her heart upon, or, let us say, who had resolved to marry at all hazards, a young gentleman of fortune much given to horseflesh, was staying under the same roof with him in a great country-house. She left nothing undone to conciliate his affections, and is even said to have taken beer at breakfast, instead of coffee, because of his very pronounced attachment to malt liquors. She went to a hunt ball, and having danced him down there, was not a little exhausted herself in consequence. The next morning, feeling rather unwell, and having lit on a MS. work of his, corresponding to what would have been an album in a youth of a literary turn, she came upon this useful recipe: "A Diet Drink after the Ball.—Take of rue two handfuls; roots of madder and sharp-pointed dock, each four ounces; guiacum wood and sassafras wood, of each two ounces. Boil them in four pints of stale beer; then strain off, and give it lukewarm." She concocted this, and had even begun to sip it, when a dear young friend, who fortunately did not happen to be her rival, expressed a doubt whether this "diet after the ball" might not refer to some equine patient—a horse, instead of a human being—as, in point of fact, it did. It had its effect, however, for her cavalier was so touched by this proof of her devoted trustfulness that he consented to be put in double harness.

A dreary dinner-party is not unusual even "in the best circles," but surely none ever came up for dismalness to that which M. Rabelles, the French artist, is said to have given the other day in Paris. Twenty years ago, it seems, he was a member of a delightful coterie of thirteen—itself an unlucky number—which included Alfred de Musset, Théophile Gautier, and other celebrities in literature or art. Year by year these friends always dined together on a certain day, and as they died off, the chairs for the whole number were still set as usual, as though in despite of death. But this year all had left the sunshine for "the sunless land" except the old artist, who, at eighty-four, dined with the twelve empty chairs around him, and nothing but the memories of the dead, the sorrowful echoes of the jests that had once set the table in a roar, for his companions! If his appetite did not fail him, I envy M. Rabelles his constitution, both of mind and body. R. KEMBLE, of London.

* This £8000 a year is paid for what is called "non-contentious" business, i. e., for merely giving advice to the Crown; if the case has to be contended, the Attorney-General is paid extra.

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

BY F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER XXIII.

AN UNEXPECTED VISITOR.

REUBEN CULWICK did not wait to hear any more, but ran at his utmost speed to the end of the street in the hope of overtaking the little feet that he thought might have strayed in the direction of the market-gardens where he had been accustomed to take her. But there was no sign of his adopted girl, and we may say at once that Reuben never saw her in Hope Street again. As suddenly as she had crossed his life, bettering and brightening it as by a strange influence for good, so suddenly did she pass away, leaving not a trace behind by which to follow her.

When he came back to Hope Lodge, baffled and heart-sick, when to all the inquiries which he made there was only one answer returned, that no one had seen poor Tots, the stern consciousness came to him that he had lost her—that the little daughter, friend, companion, would never again be as sunshine to his home. He did not betray his thoughts; he went on with his search; he expressed a confidence in her discovery that he did not realize. He "billed" every dead-wall in Camberwell with his "Rewards;" he gave all the information that he had to impart to the police; he attended at the police court to state her case before a magistrate, and to get the facts into the newspapers; but Tots returned not, and every effort was in vain. One or two scraps of information, real or false, came to the front to bewilder him, but there was no real clew obtained. A woman in the street had seen a well-dressed gentleman stooping and talking to a little golden-haired child in the Camberwell Road, and upon her asking what was the matter, she remembered the gentleman saying that the little girl had strayed from home, but that he was going to take her back again, as the child had told him where she lived; but whether this was Tots or not it was impossible to prove, and the woman begged so hard for remuneration for coming to Hope Lodge that Reuben believed she had invented the story.

In three weeks' time Reuben Culwick had learned to despair. He did not know how much he had loved the child till the house was destitute of her presence, and the little chair stood empty in the corner, and he could only look at it through his tears. Sometimes he wished that she had died, and that he had seen her buried, rather than have lost her thus, and be left to wonder where she was, and in whose hands. He became a grave man, who did not care for intrusion on his thoughts, and who resented it with bitterness. He sat in his room and brooded on the mystery; he left his desk unopened for days together; he tried to read, and failed; and when a strange stroke of good luck—in its little way—came to him, he took it grimly as a man whose spirits misfortune had crushed out. The novel which had drifted into many hands had found a patron at last, and the sum of twenty-five pounds was offered for it, the publisher taking on himself all risk. It was not a large sum, but it was more than Reuben had calculated upon, possibly more than he had been in possession of since his quarrel with his father, more than of late days he had thought the book worth. He accepted the terms, and pocketed his money, which did not make his heart lighter; he had rather have seen Tots back than his first novel in all the glory of paper and print, and that is saying an immense deal for this young man's love for the child.

Three weeks had passed, we repeat, and they were like three years to Reuben Culwick. His second cousin was getting well then, although coming back to strength with slow degrees; and he was glad of that, if he showed but little sign of rejoicing in those dull days. The loss of one protégée appeared to have weakened his interest in another, although he was always kind to Sarah Eastbell. John Jennings and his sister he had not forgiven in his heart; he attributed the loss of Tots to their want of ordinary care, and when, on one occasion, Lucy would have sermonized upon his trouble, he turned upon her with words of acrimony which she never afterward forgot. In her own way she was sorry for the child's loss too; but he did not believe it, and he told her that she had never liked her, and was glad that she was gone, and that at all events he would not have any homily or sympathy from her.

The three weeks had turned, and the fourth week had commenced with work on the Trumpet that there was no setting aside—which was all the better for Reuben at that time, and took him out of himself—when Sarah Eastbell found strength to walk down stairs, supported by Miss Jennings on one side and by Reuben on the other. The two who had rescued Sarah from danger had each a share in her first great step toward convalescence. Reuben had been anxious to place his own room at her disposal, but Lucy Jennings had interfered at once.

"No, that won't do," she had said; "she must keep with me and John until she returns to Worcester."

"I am not going to be in it."

"How's that?" asked Lucy.

He had always objected to be questioned, and he was disposed to be harsh and irritable at times now.

"Because I shall be a hundred miles away," he added, sharply.

"On business?"

"Yes."

"I am glad that you are beginning to work again," she said, very meekly.

"Why?"

"You are always at your best when you are most busy."

He did not reply, though her soft answers surprised him not a little. It was only when he was in high spirits that she was full of acerbity; in his trouble she was a gentle woman enough. They were like the two figures in the child's weather-house, and only one could come into the light at a time.

They took Sarah Eastbell down stairs, and there she said to Reuben,

"This is one step closer to Worcester, cousin."

"Yes," answered Reuben; "you and I will be marching side by side into St. Oswald's presently."

Which they never did.

When he had left for town, and for his instructions from the Trumpet, Sarah turned quickly to Lucy—

"He is better to-day. The old self is coming back that made him so dear a man."

"Don't say that," cried Lucy; "don't let a man know at any time that any one thinks he's dear to any body."

Sarah laughed at this inelegant summing up, and Lucy added, sententiously, "It would spoil the best of men."

The next day Sarah was well enough to be of use a little, and she volunteered her services to John Jennings, who was still at work for the Saxe-Gotha. He had not done well with Mr. Splud, in whom he still had a certain amount of faith, despite the fallacy of many promises; but the public came on fine nights to see the fireworks, and Mr. Splud doled out a sovereign now and then, and kept the pyrotechnist going—that is, going a little further down the hill each week.

Sarah found that she could manage "the lengths" better than John Jennings, and the long pipe-like strips, which were filled with a thin vein of gunpowder, and were afterward twisted into a variety of shapes, grew under her hands more rapidly than under Three-fingered Jack's. John Jennings was struck with this rapidity, and pondered over it. An odd idea that had been in his head some days took action upon it also. He was an amazingly slow man as a rule, but he went off like one of his own rockets after Sarah had been assisting him for a week, and Reuben was back again and oscillating in the old fashion between Camberwell and town. Sarah was stronger then; she had walked round the garden once that day before beginning work.

"You are very handy, Sarah," John said, dreamily regarding her, and leaving off his work to observe her more attentively. "It is astonishing how quickly you have taken to the business."

"If I am of assistance, I am glad."

"What a comfort you would be to a man a week or two before November, when he doesn't know which way to turn!"

"Why November?"

"Guy Fawkes season."

"Oh!" said Sarah; "I shall be a long way from here before November."

John Jennings was about to say something very quickly in reply, but he paused and stared at her instead. Suddenly he got up, unlocked his cupboard, and refreshed himself with a small glass of whisky behind the cupboard door, which he kept well between Sarah and the bottle. Lucy was up stairs setting Reuben's room to rights, and there was a fair field before him.

"You are not obliged to go away without you like," he said, as he came back and sat down.

"Oh yes, I am."

"You are very handy," he said again, "and I'm not so old as you fancy by a good many years, and you are quite a young woman. When you are well and strong, we might make a match of it, Sarah. Why not?"

"Good gracious!" said Sarah Eastbell.

It was her first offer, and she took it with a fair amount of philosophy, despite her weakness. She was more astonished than confused, although there was a flickering of color for an instant on her cheeks.

"I don't want you to hurry over it," he continued, confidentially, "or to tell Lucy any thing about it yet, or even to drop a hint to your cousin Reuben."

"They are my two best friends."

"Yes, exactly; but till you have made up your mind, I wouldn't. It will save a deal of bother."

"But I have quite made up my mind never to marry, thank you, Mr. Fireworks."

"Mr. Jennings," he said, correcting her; "artist in fire-works, which are very profitable things."

"I hope they are, for your sake," said Sarah, anxious to soften her refusal as much as possible, "and that you will make your fortune by them presently. And if you will never talk like this again—for it is great nonsense, isn't it?—I will not speak of it to any one."

"Thank you, it might be as well," said John, beginning his work again; "but it was on my mind, and I thought that I would mention it."

"It was not worth mentioning to a poor bit of a thing like me, who has hardly got back to life."

"Wasn't it, though?" said Mr. Jennings. "I think it was. And you are not a poor bit of a thing, but growing a very fine young woman, by degrees."

"Oh, Sir, please don't."

"And you are very handy at the lengths, and so pleasant and good-tempered over them, and Lucy seems to like you so much, and to be less disagree—to be so much happier, I mean," he added, quickly, "with you in the house."

"What a good woman she is!" added Sarah, striving hard for a divergence, feeling half disposed to laugh, and then to cry.

"Yes, awfully good, isn't she? She's hardly my style," he added, in his confidential tone again, "but some people would be very fond of her. She's brisk, you see."

"Yes," said Sarah, "and thoughtful, and industrious, and good."

"You said good before," replied John; "but she is not lively—she does not brighten up a place as you do."

"If you are going to say any thing more about me, Mr. Jennings, I must find my way up stairs. I'm very weak," she pleaded; "I can't bear to hear you talk in this way."

"I have done talking," said Jennings; "don't go. Lucy will be sure to ask what you have come up stairs for, and worm all the truth out of you. I haven't offended you?"

"No, I am not offended."

"I haven't jumped at this in a hurry. Ever since you have been here I have been thinking how forlorn you'll be when the old lady dies at Worcester—how lonely I shall be when Lucy marries and goes away."

"Is she likely to marry soon?"

"I sometimes fancy that your cousin Reuben and she understand each other."

"That must be wrong," replied Sarah, decisively. "I don't think she likes Reuben much."

"You are a bad judge, Sarah. You didn't think I liked you much."

"Oh, you are not coming round again to that foolish subject!" cried Sarah.

"No—only to say that I do like you, and that weeks ago I sent up my shells and maroons from the Saxe-Gotha with only half the quantity of bang in them, lest they should be too noisy for you when you were lying ill here. Wasn't that love?"

"That was considerate; but—"

"Shop!"

"A customer!" cried John Jennings, very much astonished. "Bless my soul, so there is!"

John Jennings peered over the little wire blind that screened the back parlor from vulgar gaze, and when he had regarded the customer sufficiently he went into the shop, and faced him behind the grimy counter.

"What can I have the pleasure of showing you, Sir?" he said, politely.

"Is this Hope Lodge?" was the query in reply.

"This is Hope Lodge, Sir. Jennings's."

"Ah, I'm wrong;" and the big man walked slowly and ponderously toward the door again.

"There is only one Hope Lodge in the street," John called after him. The broad pair of shoulders of the new-comer had blocked up the doorway in the act of exit, but there was a pause, and then the heavy face revolved once more in the direction of the pyrotechnist.

"Do you know any one in the street of the name of Culwick?" he asked, gruffly.

"Reuben Culwick?" inquired John.

"Yes, that is the name."

"He lives here, Sir."

"Then why the devil didn't you tell me so, instead of blinking your eyelids at me?" shouted the man, so fiercely that John Jennings backed against a gross of rocket sticks, and brought them rattling to the floor.

"This is the first time you have mentioned the name. Is it any thing from the Trumpet?"

"Trumpet—whose trumpet?"

"Ah, I see you don't know," said John, laughing a little. "It doesn't matter. Mr. Culwick is not at home."

"When will he be home?"

"I can't say, Sir, really."

"You don't seem able to say any thing sensibly," said the impolite stranger; "but I may take it that Reuben Culwick lives in this den."

"You may take it or leave it, for the matter of that, Sir," said John, put out by the man's observations. "Den, indeed!" he muttered.

"Can't you keep a civil tongue in your head?" was the next question.

"Can't you?" was the rejoinder.

The white face took purplish hues of indignation, and a thick yellow stick, with a big gold knob at the top, like a door-handle, vibrated ominously in the hand of its owner. John Jennings stood a little farther back from his side of the counter, and kept an eye on the irritable stranger.

"Do you know who I am?" the new-comer said, pompously. "Have you any idea whom you are addressing?"

"I haven't the slightest idea."

"I am Reuben Culwick's father."

"The deuce you are!" ejaculated John Jennings. "Oh, good gracious! Lord help us! What a wonderful thing that you should come here! What will he say?—what will Lucy say?—what will he do?—what shall we all do? Will you call again, Sir?—will you walk in?—will you have a drop of Trumpet? and shall I send to the whisky office for him, and tell him that you are waiting? Excuse me, Mr. Culwick, but I feel a little faint." And the pyrotechnist leaned against his back shelves, and clutched his forehead.

"You are not quite right in your head, young man," said Mr. Culwick senior, stolidly regarding him. "Isn't there any one more sensible on the premises, to whom I can intrust a message?"

"Oh yes, Sir, one or two," said John, modestly. "Will you please to do us the honor of stepping inside?"

He opened the parlor door, and Simon Culwick, of Sedge Hill, reflected for a moment, with his bushy eyebrows closing over his eyes. Then he followed Mr. Jennings into the parlor, where his grandniece, whom he had never seen, was still working busily at the "lengths."

CHAPTER XXIV.

MR. CULWICK SHOWS HIS WEAKNESS.

SIMON CULWICK walked into the parlor and sat down, crossing two big hands (on which glittered half a dozen diamond rings) upon his stick. John Jennings closed the door, and while standing with his back toward it contrived to lock it and slip the key into his coat tails. Reuben's father was captured; he must not leave till Lucy had seen him or Reuben had come back, and he would make sure of him, at least, till he had stepped up stairs and told Lucy what a distinguished guest was waiting in the parlor.

"I'll send my sister down to you, Sir, at once. You'll find that she can talk to you better than I can," he said, before disappearing up the staircase, which came into the room inelegantly.

Simon Culwick muttered something that might have passed for assent by any one of an imaginative turn of mind, and then moved his head to and fro, as a mechanical figure might have done, and took stock of the home upon which he had intruded. The broad face retained its expression or stolidity, although there were little quiverings of the eyelids that seemed to suggest some faint interest, or some passing surprise, in things which came beneath his notice; the poverty, for instance, that was apparent in the worn furniture and the old floor-cloth, from which the pattern had been scuffled years ago; the pale-faced lanky girl working at something which reminded him of macaroni unduly developed; the intensely black hue of the ceiling, the cracked condition of the looking-glass upon the mantel-piece, and the murkiness and obscurity of a dull old picture hanging by a half-frayed blind-cord above it. He was a man of observation, though he took in every thing with extraordinary slowness and gravity, as though he preferred his ideas to filter through his brain. He did nothing in a hurry; he had done nothing in a hurry for years, with the exception of flying into a passion at the opposition that encountered him at times, despite the respect and reverence to which his wealth should have entitled him.

Sarah Eastbell, ignorant of the visitor's name and position, glanced furtively at her great-uncle when she was sure that he was not looking at her, and thought what an overgrown and ugly man he was, and wondered why he was so pale, and whether even in his own heart he could imagine that those big slabs of iron-gray whiskers—pork-chop whiskers—were any ornaments to his exterior man. There had been high words in the shop between the visitor and Mr. Jennings; there was money to pay away, and Mr. Jennings had gone up stairs to find it, or, failing in his search, to send down his sister to explain the necessity of calling again. In her father's time she remembered very vividly rencontres of this character. This heavy gentleman with the broad face was the poor-rate, or the water-rate, or the man who meant to cut the gas off, and he was not going to stand any more of Mr. Jennings's nonsense. Then the glitter of the jewelry upon the fat fingers attracted her, and she thought he could hardly be the "rates;" he must be a Jew broker come to bid for the furniture, or to cart it away on account of the payments not having been punctually kept up.

Suddenly his deep voice bayed forth at her and startled her.

"What do you want for it?" he said; and she looked at him now, and discovered that he was staring at the picture above the looking-glass.

"For that, Sir?" she answered. "I don't think that it's for sale."

"What's the good of it up there?"

"I don't know, Sir."

"Nor any one else," he said, scornfully. "The gas and smoke and flies have made a mass of dirt of it."

"It's not dirt—Miss Jennings scrubbed it last Saturday," replied Sarah, in defense of the family cleanliness.

"Scrubbed it!" cried Mr. Simon Culwick, betraying extraordinary animation now.

"Yes—with soap and water."

"Mercy on us!" ejaculated Mr. Culwick.

He was utterly amazed and thrown off his guard. The sudden announcement of the death of his son would not have prostrated him half as much; he breathed with difficulty, and the eyes in his head seemed more than ever disposed to come out of it. "This was an exceedingly funny old gentleman," thought Sarah Eastbell.

Suddenly he composed himself, and all his excitement sank a long way within him, and left him as heavy as before, even a trifle sleepy, if Sarah might judge by the drooping character of the thick eyebrows.

"Soap and water are not the best things for pictures," he said, in a low growl, "although it smartens them up a little. But that's a poor daub, which nothing would hurt a great deal."

Sarah thought so too, but did not answer. Mr. Culwick looked round the room again, and gazed thoughtfully out of window at the distant summer-house, its acute angle toward total ruin interesting him a little. Suddenly the white face was upturned toward the painting again.

"If it were ever so good, it would spoil up there," he said.

"Indeed, Sir?"

"I might make a bid for it before I went away, bad as it is, if your brother would not mind taking it down presently," he continued. "It's impossible to make out what it is like up there."

"It's a girl's head, I think."

"It might as well be a sheep's," growled Mr. Culwick. "Can't you get it down now before your brother comes?"

"He is not my brother—only one of those who have been kind to me in this house."

"Oh! they are kind people here, then?" he inquired, still looking at the picture.

"Very good, and very kind."

"And very rich," he added, scornfully, and with not too much good taste.

"No, Sir; very poor. That makes their kindness and their goodness all the more grateful to me," she said, thoughtfully, "and all the more precious to God."

"Eh—what?" said the big man, taken aback by the sudden earnestness with which his companion spoke.

"And if you have come to do them a bad turn, I—I—hope you'll think about it twice, Sir," cried Sarah, leaning forward, with the tears swimming in her eyes, "for they are honest, hard-working people, and deserving of your charity."

"I have nothing to give them," he said, very firmly, in reply.

"If you have nothing to take away from them, that will do. They only wish to be left alone, to have time given them to turn round."

"Oh, do they?" and once more the eyes glanced up at the picture which had attracted so much of his attention, and even weakened the motive force that had moved this huge mass of man's flesh to Hope Street, Camberwell. "Does Mr. Reuben Culwick want time to turn round too?"

"He, Sir!" exclaimed Sarah, with a musical little laugh. "Why, no."

"I wish he did; he would be more tractable and respectful," muttered the father to himself.

"Mr. Reuben Culwick is a gentleman," cried Sarah, full of eloquence now—"a real born gentleman, the son of the richest man in Worcester."

"Has he told you that?" said Simon Culwick, with more eagerness.

"No; but I know it for myself. I have lived for some time in Worcester, where Reuben's father is well known."

"I should think he was!" said the other, conceitedly.

"He is not a gentleman like the son is—not a bit of a gentleman—but a proud, hard man, without a morsel of love for his own boy."

"You must have had all this stuff from Reuben. He talks against his father all day here, I see."

"He never mentions his name. Once, when I spoke of his father, he was very angry with me."

"And who are you?" he rejoined.

"A poor girl whom he tried to rescue from the streets—his second cousin—very much below him in the world, who was first afraid of him and doubtful of him, but who has learned to love him very much for all his kindness. If I am ever saved," she cried, enthusiastically—"and Lucy thinks I shall be—it will be Cousin Reuben who led me to the light, when there was nothing but darkness about my awful life. He want time to turn round!" she cried, scornfully. "Why, he's above all help from mortal man, Sir!"

"He saved you, and you are his second cousin. What's your name?" he said, sharply.

"Sarah Eastbell."

"The girl who tried to pass bad money down in Worcester?"

"Ah!—yes! That's true, Sir, most of it."

"But not all of it," said the thin, hard voice of Lucy Jennings, who had come down stairs noiselessly; "there was no guilty knowledge. The money was given her to pass by a scoundrel."

"It is the usual story; every one trumps up that excuse."

"Her story will be believed; it has been already believed," said Lucy.

"I don't care whether it is or not. It is no business of mine," replied Simon Culwick.

"Yes, it is," said Miss Jennings, flatly contradicting him, to his indignation and surprise; "for that child is your sister's granddaughter, and you have the honor of your family to consider."

"Confusion!" exclaimed Mr. Culwick, his face darkening as he spoke. "What's the honor of my family to me? I can't look after it; I don't know any thing of my sister's relations; to my own sister I haven't spoken for years. Hasn't my son Reuben told you that? He seems to have kept you well posted up in my affairs."

"Your son has not told us much; his mother, who died in this house, was more communicative."

He started at the mention of his wife's name.

"Ay; I don't doubt it."

The bushy brows were knitted again ominously, and there was a suppressed emotion in his voice which he found it difficult to disguise, and which Lucy Jennings was quick enough to detect. She did not address him again, but took a seat near Sarah Eastbell, and left him to himself. He was a sufficient study for her, without breaking in upon his reverie. He was worth watching, and thinking about. A word from this man could change the whole future of another man's life—lift Reuben Culwick from respectable indigence to riches—set him apart from this narrow sphere forever. What had he come for but to clasp his son to that broad chest, and offer his forgiveness and forgetfulness for all the past wherein they had not agreed? This was the return visit to Reuben's at Sedge Hill some weeks ago; the old man was lonely, and remembered at last that his own flesh and blood had stronger claims upon him than the rest of the world. And yet she did not like his face; the more she looked at it the less she liked it, and him to whom it belonged. It was an apathetic and yet miserable face, into which no one would look for charity or brotherly love; there was a poverty of expression in it that said very little; and there was an arrogance, or self-conceit, or something akin to it, that said too much.

Hosted by Google

His head began to move again amidst the creases of his thick black stock in his old mechanical fashion, and the eyes were upturned to the picture once more.

"Do you want to sell that thing?" he said to Lucy.

"What thing?"

"That old painting over the looking-glass."

"Is it worth any thing?" asked Lucy, curiously.

"A couple of pounds, perhaps, if it were touched up. I would not mind giving a couple of pounds for it, as a speculation."

"It's worth considering," said Lucy.

Mr. Culwick regarded Miss Jennings with more interest.

"I'll take it away with me, if you like," he said; and Lucy Jennings looked hard at him.

"My father used to talk of that picture," said Lucy; "but when I tried to sell it, there was only five shillings offered at Jones's."

"About its value; but still I don't mind a couple of sovereigns."

"It isn't mine to sell."

"What—whose picture is it, then?"

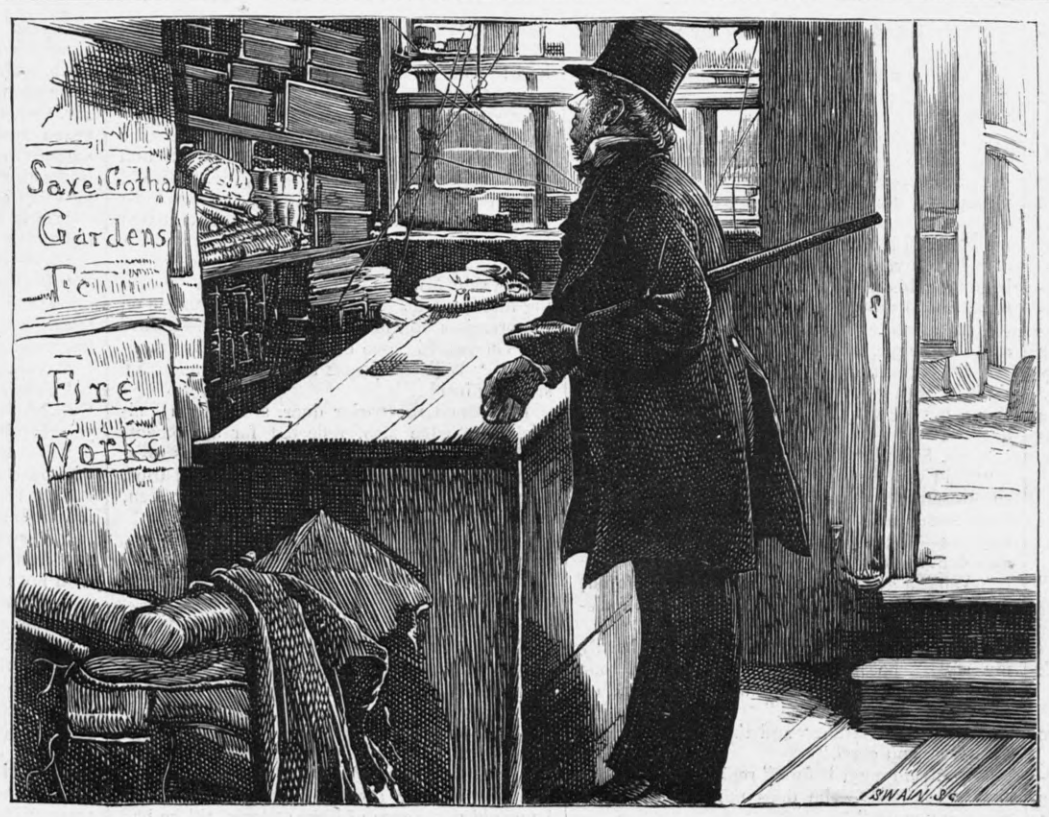
"My brother John's."

"Will he part with it for two pounds?"

"He would part with his soul for two pounds, almost," said Lucy, acrimoniously.

Mr. Culwick relapsed into silence, and Lucy looked at the picture instead of at him, as if curious to see where the gentleman had discovered two pounds' worth of value in the article. Presently he said,

"Where is your brother?"



"SHOP!"

"Busy," said Lucy.

"Can't he take it down—can't you get it?" he went on, with anxiety. "I'm too heavy to stand on these shaky chairs, or I would reach it down myself."

The love of the man for pictures seemed affecting his mind, he woke up to so much interest and anxiety concerning John Jennings's one specimen. He had met with a surprise here, and it had taken the thoughts of his son out of his head, till Lucy recalled him to himself.

"If you will go up stairs to your son's room, and wait for him, I will bring the picture to you," said Lucy.

"Doesn't he live with you? Has he apartments here?"

"To be sure. You did not think that he shared our troubles as well as his own, and made our home and our lives part of his?"

"I have never thought about it," was the short answer.

He thought of little save himself, Lucy Jennings fancied, and she was about to tell him so, with that charming outspokenness which was one of her most forcible traits of character, when she restrained her tongue.

"Where's his room?" asked Mr. Culwick, after this.

"The first-floor front; up those stairs," Lucy answered.

Mr. Culwick rose at once, and toiled with difficulty up the stairs like a man anxious to be rid of objectionable company. He went into his son's room, where the appointments surprised him by contrast with the room which he had quitted; where there was evidence of comfort, if not of luxury, and where there were many shelves of books. He walked to the table, and looked down at the letters and papers; he walked to the window, and looked out into Hope Street; he walked to the mantel-piece, and peered, in a short-sighted way, at a photograph, from which he suddenly bobbed his head back as though he had been stung. It was the portrait of his wife, reverently enshrined in a gold frame. There was a huge arm-chair in the room, into which he cautiously lowered himself, and set his hat by his side; but he rose with the alacrity of youth again as Lucy came in with the picture in her hand.

"I am glad you have got it down. Great Heaven, what a state it is in!" he said, taking it from her hands. "You have rubbed it most infernally."

"I hope it will amuse you till your son returns," said Lucy, "and I give him the good news that you are waiting for him."

"Good news!" said the other, in an ironical tone, as he stooped over the picture still.

"It will be good news, surely," said Lucy; "for you have come to this house in a contrite spirit."

"In a what?"

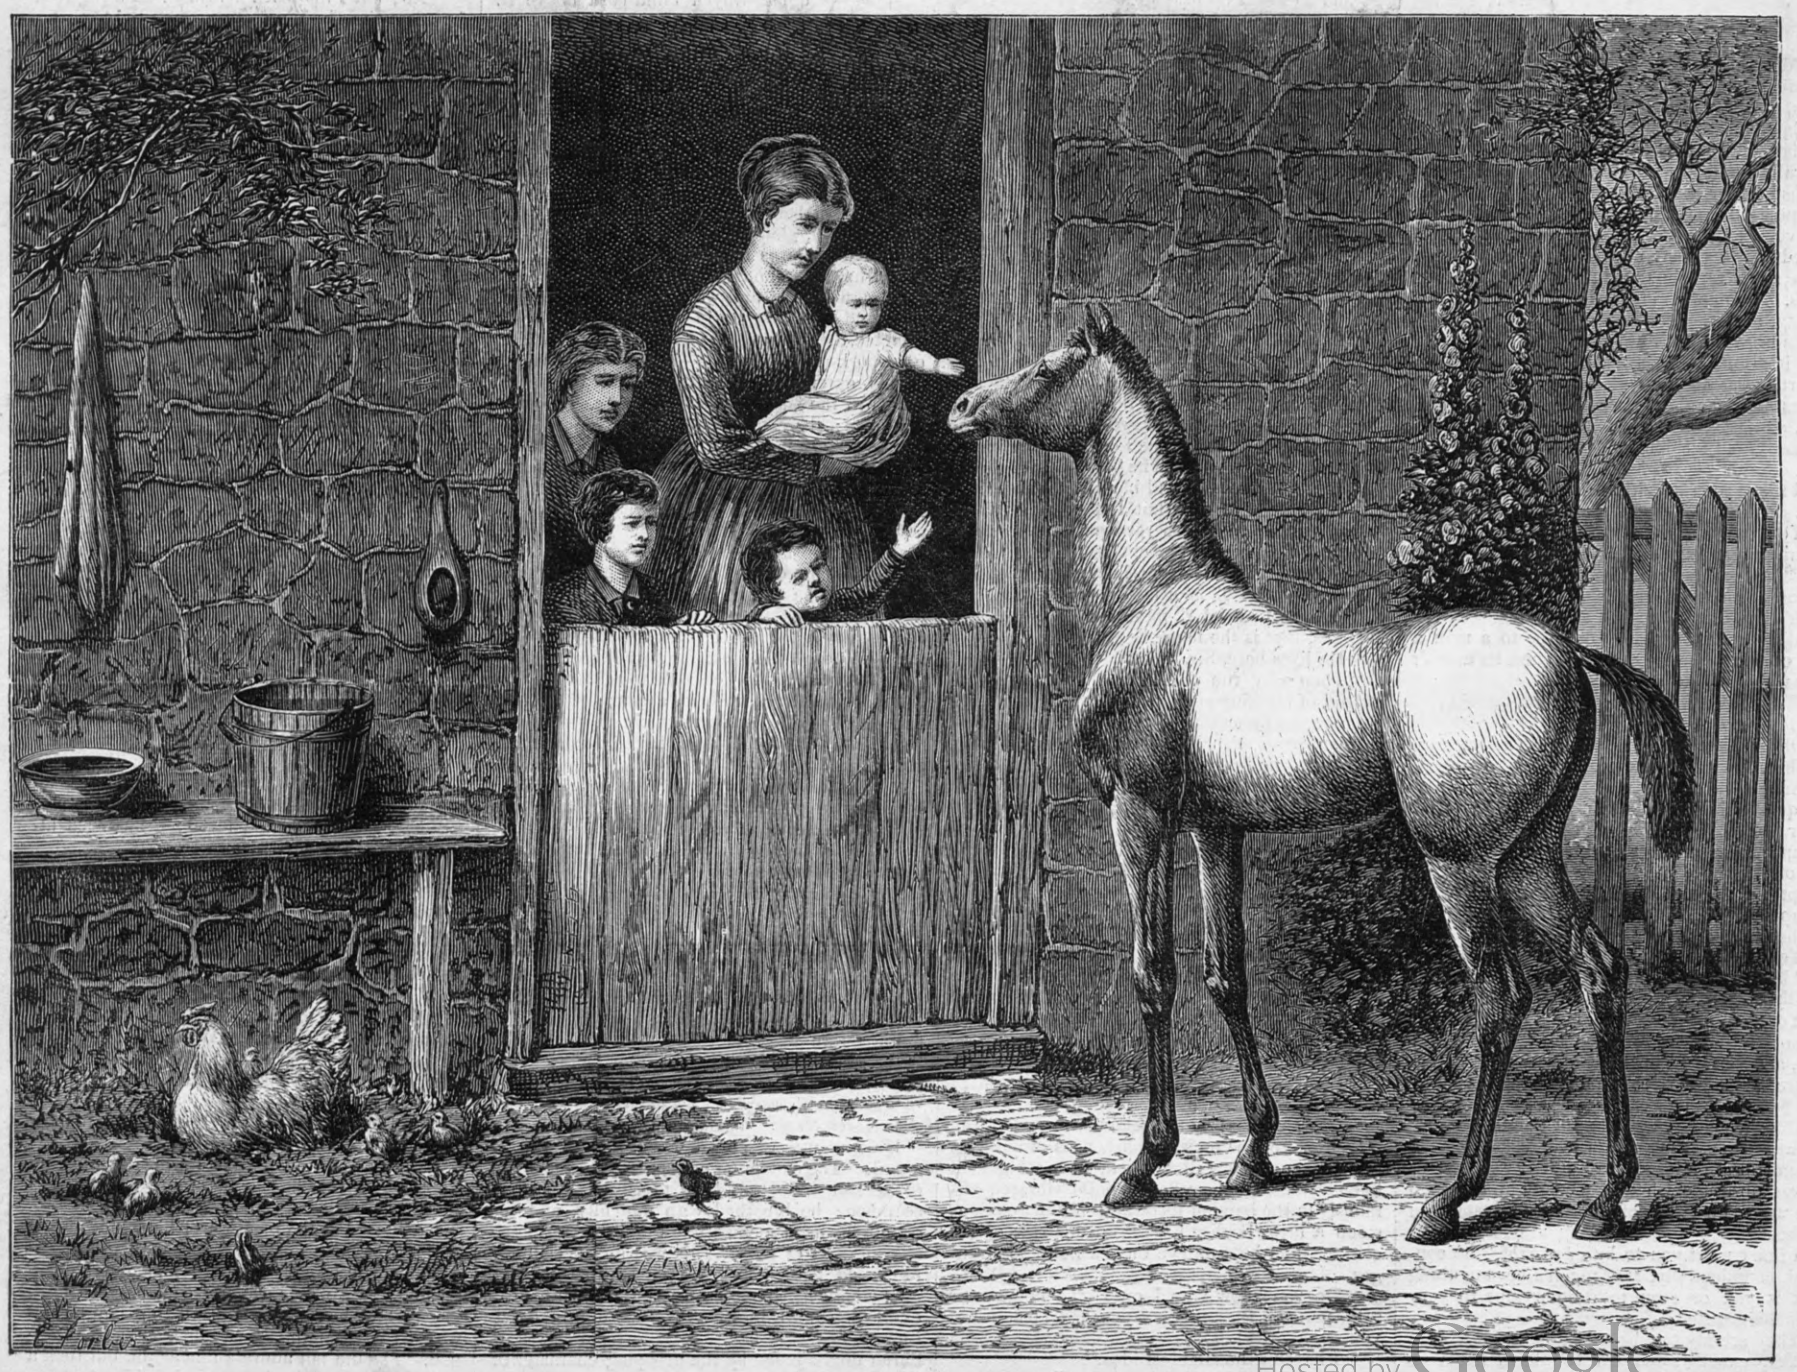
"In a spirit of peace and good-will—to forgive him, and to ask forgiveness in return for your own hardness of heart—to forget the past, and be friends."

"Pooh! Nothing of the sort," said Simon Culwick.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE HOUSEHOLD PETS.

THEY are all here—the children, the chickens, and the pony; but just now the pony appears as the pet of the pets, which even the baby strokes fearlessly as he puts his soft nose inside the door in search of his accustomed lunch of sugar from familiar hands. Parents do well to encourage their children in that love of pets which is natural to them, and which develops gentleness and kindliness. There is no more deplorable disposition in a child than that of cruelty to animals. The boy who treats his kittens and puppies tenderly, and who always has a kind word for each bird and animal about him, is almost sure to grow up with a loving nature, which makes him beloved in turn. That Louis XV. wept when a child at the death of his pet fawn, and, as a man, looked with stolid eyes on the misery of a kingdom, only shows that exceptions prove the rule. And in like manner the household which cherishes its numerous pets is far more likely to clothe the naked and feed the hungry than that which grudges a bone for a dog or a kind word to a horse, and which regards the keeping of pets as a wasteful extravagance.



THE HOUSEHOLD PETS.

Hosted by Google

A NUBIAN GIRL.—[FROM THE PICTURE BY EGRON LUNDGREN.]

A NUBIAN GIRL.

THIS beautiful engraving is from a picture painted in Cairo by a Swedish artist, Mr. Egron Lundgren. Cairo is much frequented by Nubians, who go thither in search of employment. The Nubians and Abyssinians are the handsomest of the African races—straight, tall, well-made, and with well-cut features. They are a mixture of Arabians and Ethiopians, and are honest, brave, and independent in nature. The women have pleasing faces and agreeable manners, without being remarkable for beauty. Nubia is a country full of interest, whose antiquities and monumental remains equal in many respects those of Egypt, with rock temples and colossal figures which fill the spectator with wonder after a lapse of three thousand years, and make him almost doubt the progress of our boasted nineteenth century.

CATARACT SCREENS.

A VERY pretty and graceful screen for the front of a grate in summer-time may be made in the following manner: Take a yard and a quarter of white tarlatan of quite coarse quality, and sew one end of it along a strip of muslin; then begin at the opposite end, and cut the whole piece into lengthwise strips three inches wide, up to the end where the muslin strip is, which thus answers the purpose of holding them all together. Next ravel out one inch on either side of these strips, leaving an inch in the centre. Let the muslin end be pressed into the flue or top of the grate, and arrange the strips so as to fall gracefully over the bars, to look as much as possible like a cataract, and the ravelings must be thrown in around the base to represent foam. If properly done, the effect is very pleasing, and will be generally admired.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. R. K.—Satin is coming into vogue again, though velvet and gros grain pipings are still preferred. Lace is very little used, though it is never out of style altogether.

T. W. D.—The black marten and lynx fur trimmings described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 46, Vol. VI., are what you want for your cloth cloak.

IGNORAMUS.—Of course you should call on a bride after receiving an invitation to the wedding reception. That you were not invited to witness the ceremony is accounted for by the fact that this privilege is often reserved for intimate friends alone. You can afterward do as you choose about continuing the acquaintance.

J. A. P. H.—The "Ugly Girl" articles will shortly be published in book form. You can order the papers containing them from this office at ten cents each.

PARKER.—Arm-seye is the technical phraseology for armhole. We dare say that you will find many words in the vocabulary of dress-makers that are not found in Webster or Worcester, who wrote in a less advanced age than the present, and who would have to enlarge their works greatly to satisfy all the exigencies of the language of fashion.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Get light-tinted or else white gloves for the ceremony, as you are to be married without your bonnet, and let the groom get the same shade. If you wear your bonnet, thus completing your traveling suit, you should also wear dark gloves to correspond.

MINNIE.—Put rows of black Hercules braid on children's water-proofs, or else scallop the edges, and bind with braid.

MRS. M. A. W.—We have not the pattern you want.

FASHION.—The ample Dolman cloak, or else a polonaise, is the choice for winter wraps. There is such a preference for fur cloaks now that little variety or novelty is found in cloaks of other materials.

SARAH Q.—Navy blue diagonal or old-fashioned serge is the best material for an inexpensive suit this winter. You can get it for 75 cents, and it will also answer for the bride's traveling dress. Indigo blue for you and darkest myrtle green for her will be the best choice. Make a belted polonaise and English walking jacket for yourself. Your fringe is too deep. Folds, bias bands, and velveteen collars and cuffs will be enough without it.

A. D. F.—Comb your curly hair for several minutes each night, holding your head over a heated stove or register till the locks feel soft and moist. Keep the head thoroughly clean.

DORA DILL.—Little English walking jackets of diagonal cloth, made double-breasted, and edged with fur, are worn by girls of ten years.

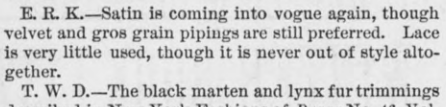
MRS. M. B. H.—We commend the demi-polonaise walking suit pattern for black silk dresses.

ANXIOUS MAMMA.—Double capes of merino, to be shortened afterward to a walking coat, is the best model for your infant's cloak. Use the demi-polonaise pattern for your plum-colored cashmere. It is a matter of taste about using black or self-colored pockets, revers, etc., on polonaises, but enormous buttons are already out of favor.

E. V. K.—Bathe the moist hands with camphor, and dust when dry with Lubin's powder or corn starch.

FLORID.—See future number of "Ugly Girl" papers.

GRACE.—Tar and olive-oil are not recommended as blood purifiers. They are used as an ointment for the face, melting a very small quantity of the tar in heated oil, and applying when thoroughly mixed. The proportions may be found by experiment, the mixture being like sirup when made.



COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR Falling, Loss, and Untimely Gray Hair consult Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N.Y.

DR. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, cures all Scalp Diseases.

DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York, cures unnatural redness of the Nose or Face.

BEARDSLEY'S PATENT SEWING-MACHINE
NEEDLE-THREADER.
Best thing out for use. Agents wanted, men and women. Quick sales, big profits. Order Circular, or mail 50c. for sample. IXL NEEDLE WORKS, Ansonia, Conn.

SHOPPING
Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

PARIS NOVELTIES ☞ JUST RECEIVED.
The Elegant "PANSY" Corset, the GRACEFUL Corset, NEW BUSTLES, Embroidered Underwear, Undressed Kid Gloves, Fine Fans, and Gift Goods.
J. C. DEVIN,
Under Sturtevant House, 1192 Broadway.

A BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION.
BARRY'S
Pearl Cream
imparts to the darkest skin a clear natural white, tinged with the Faintest Rose Blush.
Sold by all druggists, and at the depot, 26 Liberty St., New York.
Only 50 Cents per Bottle.

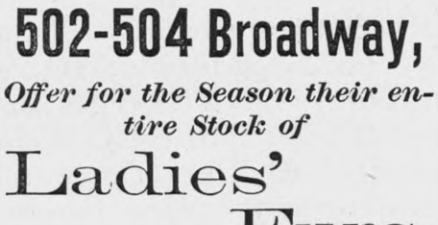
LADIES! CONSTITUTION WATER IS GOOD FOR ALL FEMALE COMPLAINTS; gives immediate relief. Dose 40 drops. Send for circular. MORGAN & ALLEN, Agents, 59 John Street.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS
502-504 Broadway,
Offer for the Season their entire Stock of
Ladies' Furs,
including a Very Extensive and Elegant Assortment of
Seal-Skin Furs,
in all Styles and Qualities, at greatly
Reduced Prices.
502-504 Broadway.

NO mere pretension, but positive proof to every body who will visit the large hair establishment of
L. SHAW.
Great Sacrifice in Human Hair at L. SHAW'S,
364 Bowery, cor. Fourth Street, and 345 Sixth Avenue, Between 21st & 22d Streets.
On account of the general depression in business,
$30 000
worth of first quality pure French Hair, made up into switches and curls, will be sold at GREATLY REDUCED prices, which puts it within the reach of every body to procure a handsome holiday present at a merely nominal figure, and enables me to keep my factory hands employed during the winter.
Every body in want of a handsome Switch should take advantage of this opportunity and call at L. SHAW'S large Hair Establishment before purchasing elsewhere.
Every article WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.
I can offer to the Public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.
PRICE-LIST.
Misses' Hair Switches, $1 and upward; Finest Quality of Hair Switches, solid and dyed.
18 inches long, 4 ounces weight...$4; formerly $5.
22 inches long, 4 ounces weight...$5; formerly $6.
26 inches long, 4 ounces weight...$7; formerly $8.
32 inches long, 4 ounces weight...$9; formerly $10.
Shaw's patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, naturally Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.



THREE PAIR
Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, and Dress-Trimmings. A splendid Black Dress Silk, $1 25 yard. Heavy Black Silk Velvet, only $2 yard—worth double. Samples sent free.

FINE FURS
of every description at less than manufacturers' prices. ☞ Send for Price-List. All goods selected therefrom sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

THE SABBATH
THE LATEST, THE GREATEST, AND THE BEST TUNE BOOK FOR Church Choirs of all Denominations.
Price, $1.50.
Per dozen Copies, $18 50.
One Sample Copy, by Mail, $1.25.
LEE & WALKER, 922 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

ALUMINOUS AND ORNAMENTAL
BUILDING PAPER
Paper Carpeting and Oil Cloth.
Send for Samples and Price-List.
W. H. H. ROGERS & CO., 2 & 3 College Place, N. Y. F. N. DAVIS & CO., Beloit, Wis.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

THE COMPANION aims to be a favorite in every family—looked for eagerly by the young folks, and read with interest by the older. Its purpose is to interest while it amuses; to be judicious, practical, sensible; and to have really permanent worth, while it attracts for the hour.

It is handsomely illustrated, and has for contributors some of the most attractive writers in the country. Among these are

Edward Eggleston, Dr. I. I. Hayes,
Prof. Jas. DeMille, Louise C. Moulton,
Louisa M. Alcott, "Sophia May,"
Rebecca H. Davis, C. A. Stephens,
C. W. Flanders, Ruth Chesterfield,
S. S. Robbins, M. A. Denison.

Its reading is adapted to the old and young; is very varied in its character; sprightly and entertaining. It gives

Stories of Adventure, Stories of Home and Letters of Travel, School Life,
Editorials upon Current Topics, Tales, Poetry,
Historical Articles, Selections for Declamation,
Biographical Sketches, Anecdotes, Puzzles,
Religious Articles, Facts & Incidents.

☞ Subscription Price, $1 50. Specimen copies sent free. Address,
Perry Mason & Co.,
41 Temple Place, Boston, Mass.

BEAUTIFY THE SKIN
BY USING LAIRD'S
"Bloom of Youth."

This harmless & delightful toilet preparation will remove all discolorations and blemishes from the skin, leaving it SOFT, CLEAR, SMOOTH, and BEAUTIFUL.
SOLD AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

A. SELIG,
(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),
No. 813 Broadway, New York,
Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.
Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN SUPPORTER
FOR LADIES And Gentlemen

☞ HAS NO WHALEBONES OR STEEL RIBS; NO ELASTIC OR RUBBER BANDS; is easily adjusted, and fits the form perfectly. Send for circular. D. C. HALL & CO., No. 44 West Broadway, N. Y., Sole Agents for Smith's Perforated Buckskin Under-garments, and Sibley's Patent Dress Shields.

$1 50.—THE NURSERY.
A Monthly Magazine for Youngest Readers. Superbly Illustrated. SEND STAMP FOR A SAMPLE NUMBER. Now is the time to subscribe. JOHN L. SHOREY, 36 Bromfield Street, Boston.

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS and a book of forty pages mailed for FIFTY CENTS, by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

SOMETHING NEW.—A Toy sent free for 15c. Address TOY, 435 N. 10th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

LADIES! JUST THE PAPER FOR YOU!!!
Send stamp for Specimen Copy ☞ Free.

The Ladies' Floral Cabinet
And Pictorial Home Companion.
Devoted to Illustrated Home Literature.
☞ A new and beautiful Paper, containing exquisite engravings of Home Life, Society, and Amusements. LADIES will be interested in its design of Household Elegancies, and information on Dress, Housekeeping, &c. YOUNG PEOPLE will find in it useful hints on Self-Improvement, Manners, Society, Stories, &c. FLOWER LOVERS will be especially delighted with its directions on Growing Flowers and Window Gardening. Gives full information about Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. Try it. The prettiest of Family Pictorial Papers.
Price $1 50 per year.....including Three Chromos.
" $1 25 " " ..... " One "
Price 25 cents on trial three months.
☞ CLUB AGENTS WANTED. Premium List Free. Address
LADIES' FLORAL CABINET CO.,
Box 2445. New York City.

REDUCED.
Union Adams & Co.
ARE OFFERING AT VERY LOW PRICES
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
UNDERWEAR,
Shirts & Collars,
HANDKERCHIEFS,
SUSPENDERS,
ROBES, JACKETS, &c.
637 BROADWAY.

$250,000 Hair Sale!!
Endorsing the plan adopted by large Dry Goods firms, and to keep my factory hands employed during the Winter, I reduce price of HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES to cost of Hair and workmanship, to give all an opportunity to buy just what is needed for present and all fashions. ☞ Don't delay.
A USEFUL HOLIDAY PRESENT.
☞ No Crimped Hair in, Solid, FIRST QUALITY, and Warranted NOT DYED Hair:

2½	oz.,	28	in.	long;	former price	$6 00;	reduced to	$4 80
2¾	"	30	"	"	"	7 50;	"	6 00
3	"	32	"	"	"	9 00;	"	7 20
4	"	32	"	"	"	12 00;	"	9 60
5	"	32	"	"	"	15 00;	"	12 00
6	"	32	"	"	"	18 00;	"	14 40

Sent prepaid on receipt of price, or C. O. D. by express, with privilege to examine. CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity Street, New York.
Ask your druggist for Peckham's Leucothea, the very best preparation for beautifying the complexion. Try it. You will always use it. Price $1 per Bottle.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.
BROADWAY, cor. 19th St., N. Y.

GENUINE FURS.
SEAL, SABLE, MINK, CHINCHILLA, ERMINE, AND BLACK MARTEN SETS.
LADIES' and GENTS' SEAL CAPS, GLOVES, AND COLLARS.
FUR ROBES AND TRIMMINGS.
LADIES' FUR-LINED CARRIAGE CLOAKS, &c.
BARGAINS for the HOLIDAYS.

INDIA SHAWLS.
STRIPED INDIA LONG SHAWLS, from $20 and upward.
FILLED CENTRE SQUARE SHAWLS, $35 and upward.

WE ARE OFFERING A FINE ASSORTMENT OF Striped Fancy Colored Silks,
at 75 cents per yard.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
A large assortment of ENGLISH & FRENCH
Dress Goods, Prints, &c,
CUT IN DRESS LENGTHS.
The above, for the convenience of customers, will be placed on a separate counter.

FURNISHING GOODS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.
GENTS' MORNING WRAPPERS.
GENTS' SMOKING JACKETS.
GENTS' CARDIGAN JACKETS.
GENTS' BUCKSKIN UNDERWEAR.
GENTS' EMBROIDERED SHIRT-BOSOMS.
GENTS' SILK MUFFLERS.
GENTS' NECK-WEAR in all the LEADING Styles.

BROADWAY, cor. Nineteenth Street.

Mr. JACKSON, 729 Broadway, N. Y., is selling fine all-wool Cashmeres, over a yard wide, at 90c. and $1 per yard, and Tamise and Biarritz Cord at about half their former price. These goods are not old stock; they are fresh and warranted. Alpacas also, of an excellent quality, are offered for 37½c. per yard—really less than they could have been bought for in gold before the war.
Such inducements as these can, of course, only last a very short time. Black goods and all fabrics for which there is a steady demand are on the rise, stocks in the importers' hands being very light. In the auction-room they have risen 12c. upon the yard within a week.—Daily Graphic.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

FRENCH EMBROIDERIES AND STAMPING.—V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N. Y. Lingerie, Ladies' and Babies' Trousseau. Direct importation. Finest stock on hand. Orders filled with care. Specialty of Monograms. MACHINES and Perforated PATTERNS.

Hosted by Google

EHRICH'S.

FURS! FURS! FURS! FURS!

Best and Cheapest in the Country.

Our Furs are exclusively of our own manufacture, and have all been made up with special attention to fineness of Fur and excellence of workmanship. Yet our saving of manufacturers' profits has been so large as to explain our startling prices.

We cordially invite ladies to examine our Furs, and will always esteem it a pleasure to show them, whether they are ready to purchase or not.

We allow no misrepresentations. Every article warranted as represented.

TOYS.

Ladies who wish to see the finest assortment of Toys and Holiday Goods in the United States, selected specially for us in Vienna, Saxony, and Paris, should not fail to pay an early visit to our dominion of Santa Claus. Special rates to Superintendents of Sunday-Schools, Asylums, Fairs, &c., &c.

Rosewood Writing-Desks and Work-Boxes, inlaid with pearl and silver, Dressing Cases, Watch-Stands, &c. Berlin Worsted Embroideries, Slipper Patterns, Lambrequins, &c. Real Lace Collars, Barbes, and Handkerchiefs, &c.; and thousands of articles suitable for fine

Holiday Presents.

☞ EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS in Real Laces, Black Silks, Alpacas, Shawls, Cloaks, Dress Trimmings, &c., &c.

We have just received the first two Prizes at the American Institute Fair for the superior quality of our Ladies' and Infants' Wear and Millinery Goods, and, therefore, feel warranted in calling the attention of Ladies to our superb assortment of

TRIMMED AND UNTRIMMED

HATS, FEATHERS, FLOWERS, RIBBONS,

and FULL TROUSSEAUX for LADIES, MISSES, AND INFANTS.

We make a specialty of Fine French Underwear.

Send for Fall Catalogue to

EHRICH'S,

287 & 289 8th AVE., Near 24th ST., New York.

SPECIAL BARGAINS

AT

STERN BROTHERS

Sixth Ave. and Twenty-Third St.,

NEW YORK.

Unparalleled inducements throughout our entire Establishment, in order to make room for our importations of

Holiday Goods

WHICH WE ARE DAILY RECEIVING.

Just received, per steamship "Silesia," two entire cases. ☞ 400 Dozen of our justly-celebrated

LUPIN'S KID GLOVES,

In Two, Three, Four, and Six Buttons.

Every pair especially selected, and in all the new shades of Bronzes, Resedas, Drab, Brown, and Opera Colors.

NOTE THE PRICES:

2 Buttons, $1 10 } Quality Guaranteed. { 4 Buttons, $1 50

3 Buttons, $1 31 } { 6 Buttons, $1 75

We beg our numerous friends and customers to give these Gloves a trial, as we guarantee in every way satisfaction.

Still further reductions in

Trimming and Cloaking Velvets,

Black Silk Trimming Velvets,

Splendid quality, at $1 50, $1 85, $2 25, $2 50.

Colored Silk Velvets, in all the desirable colors, from $1 00 a yard upward, according to color.

Elegant Satins, in all colors, reduced to $1 a yard.

Rare inducements in

BLACK ALL-SILK CLOAK VELVET.

5 pieces, all-silk, extra quality, 24 in. wide.....$5 25
7 pieces, all-silk, finest quality, 28 in. wide..... 6 75
Guinet & Cie., finest make and finish, at $8 00 & $10 00

Our immense assortment of
DRESS AND CLOAK TRIMMINGS,
REAL GUIPURE AND THREAD LACES,
PLAIN AND BEADED YAK LACES,
POINT and POINT APPLIQUE LACES,

☞ At a further reduction of 12½ per cent.

We direct attention to our attractive stock of

BERLIN WORSTED EMBROIDERIES.

Cushions, Slippers, Rugs, Chair Strips, Brackets, &c., &c., &c., with all necessary materials.

LADIES at a distance, in ordering any thing in this line, by stating article, color, size, &c., can rest assured of having the same promptly attended to at lowest prices.

Especial attention paid to Orders.

STERN BROTHERS,

Sixth Avenue and 23d Street, New York.

Further Reductions!

MILLER & GRANT,

No. 879 BROADWAY,

In addition to reductions already made, have determined, in order to make room for Spring importations, to offer their IMMENSE STOCK of

Laces,	Embroideries,
Dress Trimmings,	Ribbons,
Trimming Silks,	Velours, &c., &c.,

At a further Reduction of Ten per Cent. on all Cash Purchases

---

For the Holidays!!!

Holiday Gifts in Silks, Dress Goods, Suits, Shawls, Cloaks, Laces, Embroideries, Furs, Seal-Skin, &c., &c. ☞ Also, a very large and handsome assortment of Toys, Fancy Goods, Perfumery, Soaps, &c., &c. ☞ The Toys are a consignment from a leading importing house, and will be sold at a Great SACRIFICE!!!

LORD & TAYLOR,

Broadway and Twentieth St., New York.

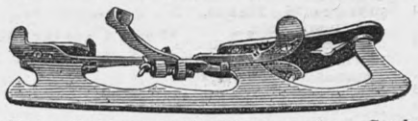
KNABE

Grand, Square, & Upright Pianos,

New York House, No. 112 5th Ave.

WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

THE AMERICAN CLUB SKATE.



Skaters that have used it will use no other. Can be adjusted instantly. Requires no heel plate and straps or key. Don't get out of order. Made of the best welded steel, and every pair warranted. Samples sent C. O. D. Price, No. 1, blued tops, $6 00; No. 2, full polished, $7 00; or nickel-plated, $9 00. A discount to dealers or schools ordering six pairs or more at one time. Address PECK & SNYDER,

Manufacturers, 126 Nassau Street, N. Y.

☞ N. B.—Send stamp for our New Catalogue of all styles of Skates, Boxing Gloves, &c.

HOLIDAY GOODS

Shaw & Eaton

Are offering THE LATEST NOVELTIES in LACE FICHUS, CAPES, COLLARETTES, SCARFS, TIES, &c., at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

1105 BROADWAY, bet. 24th & 25th Sts., N. Y.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. Printed Directions accompany each Pattern. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)....	No. 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER.....	" 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers).....	" 6
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt.....	" 20
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER..	" 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old).....	" 25
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown).....	" 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old)	" 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt.....	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT....	" 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt.....	" 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT.....	" 46
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt).....	" 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT	" 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt.....	" 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old).....	" 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT....	" 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT.....	" 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.....	" 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.	" 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.....	" 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT.....	" 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT.....	" 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT.....	" 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT.....	" 39
DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, with Basque Back and Square Front.....	" 43
TIGHT-FITTING DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE, with French Round Skirt.....	" 45
SINGLE-BREASTED BASQUINE, with Short Pouf Walking Skirt.....	" 47
DOUBLE-BREASTED PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron Front and Square Back Over-skirt and Long Walking Skirt.....	" 47
DOLMAN DEMI-TRAINED SUIT.....	" 48
WATER-PROOF CLOAK, with Cape and Sleeves.....	" 50
TIGHT-FITTING SINGLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE HOUSE DRESS.....	" 50
BOY'S WARDROBE, Overcoat with Cape, Jacket, Vest, Knee Pantaloons, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 4 to 9 years old).....	" 52

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

---

200 Pianos AND Organs,

New and Second-hand, of First-class Makers, will be sold at Lower Prices for cash, or on Installments, or for rent, in City or Country, during this Financial Crisis, and the HOLIDAYS, by HORACE WATERS & SON, No. 481 Broadway, than ever before offered in New York. Agents wanted for the sale of Waters' Celebrated Pianos, Concerto and Orchestral Organs. Illustrated Catalogues Mailed. Great Inducements to the Trade. A large discount to Ministers, Churches, Sunday-Schools, &c.

SCHOOLDAY MAGAZINE.

ONLY $1.00 A YEAR

Eighteenth year. The Cheapest and best Young Folks' Magazine published. A fine 82 Engraving FREE to every subscriber. GOOD PAY to Agents. Send a three-cent stamp for Specimen and "tools" to work with. Address the Publishers,

J. W. DAUGHADAY & CO.,
436 Walnut St. Philadelphia, Pa.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00; postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS' WINTER BOOK-LIST.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.

SARA COLERIDGE'S MEMOIR AND LETTERS. Memoir and Letters of Sara Coleridge. Edited by her Daughter. With Two Portraits on Steel. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

II.

HER FACE WAS HER FORTUNE. A Novel. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "For Her Sake," "Carry's Confession," "No Man's Friend," "Poor Humanity," "Little Kate Kirby," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

III.

PLUMER'S PASTORAL THEOLOGY. Hints and Helps in Pastoral Theology. By WILLIAM S. PLUMER, D.D., LL.D. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

IV.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NOVELS. (HARPER'S LIBRARY EDITION.) Now ready:

THE NEW MAGDALEN.—THE WOMAN IN WHITE.—POOR MISS FINCH.—MAN AND WIFE. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 each. Other volumes will be issued shortly.

V.

HERVEY'S CHRISTIAN RHETORIC. A System of Christian Rhetoric, for the Use of Preachers and Other Speakers. By GEORGE WINFRED HERVEY, M.A., Author of "Rhetoric of Conversation," "Principles of Courtesy," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

VI.

THE TWO WIDOWS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "Called to Account," "Played Out," "A Passion in Tatters," "The Dower House," "Maud Mohan," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VII.

PIKE'S SUB-TROPICAL RAMBLES. Sub-Tropical Rambles in the Land of the Aphanapteryx. By NICOLAS PIKE, U. S. Consul, Port Louis, Mauritius. Profusely Illustrated from the Author's own Sketches; containing also Maps and valuable Meteorological Charts. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

VIII.

MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. A Novel. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

IX.

DAWSON'S EARTH AND MAN. The Story of the Earth and Man. By J. W. DAWSON, LL.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University, Montreal. With Twenty Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

X.

STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. A Novel. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

XI.

THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

XII.

A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

XIII.

FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

XIV.

HARPER'S HOUSEHOLD DICKENS. With Original Characteristic Illustrations by American and English Artists.

OLIVER TWIST. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.—MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.—THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.—DAVID COPPERFIELD. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.—DOMBEY AND SON. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.—NICHOLAS NICKLEBY. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.—BLEAK HOUSE. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.—PICKWICK PAPERS. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.—LITTLE DORRIT. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y.

PRICE $290. U. S.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

PLEASANT and profitable employment for Women can be had by taking subscriptions for "WHAT WOMAN SHOULD KNOW." A complete book on the physiology, health, and life of women. Has sold tremendously, and, as it is the only work of the kind ever written by a woman, is highly prized. Some lady agents have sold over 500 copies already. Notwithstanding the times, this book will sell largely. Sample sheets and terms sent free, by J. M. STODDART & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

VISITING Cards 50cts. A Pack of 30 Post paid by F. C. Anderson. 165 Market St NEWARK, New Jersey samples sent

---

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N. Y.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LININGTON, Chicago.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$375 A MONTH to Male or Female Agents. NOVELTY COMPANY, Biddeford, Me.

$20 PER DAY. 1000 Agents wanted. Particulars free. A. H. BLAIR & CO., St. Louis, Mo

Hosted by Google

A JOTTING FROM THE RACES.

THE FAVORITE. WINNING BY A NECK.

FACETIÆ.

POLITICAL orators in the West indulge in some high-flown asseverations in regard to their firmness of principle. The following is a moderate specimen: "Build a worm-fence around the winter's supply of summer weather, skim the clouds from the sky with a teaspoon, catch a thunder-cloud in a bladder, break a hurricane to harness, ground-sluice an earthquake, lasso an avalanche, pin a napkin on the crater of an active volcano—but never expect to see me false to my principles."

FASHIONABLE INTELLIGENCE.—Ladies, this winter, will wear the same things they wore last year—if they can't buy others.

NEW PROVERB.—Train up an engine in the way it should go, and when the proper time comes it will run into another.

A man wrote to the editor of a horticultural paper, asking,

"What are the most advantageous additions to dried grasses for winter ornament?"

The editor replied, briefly:

"SIR,—Aeroclinium roseum, A. alba, Gomphrena globosa, and G. globosa carnea.

"Yours truly, THE EDITOR."

The querist answered, in a passion, that he had never been so much insulted in his life by the use of bad language.

A CONGENIAL TASTE.—It is a remarkable fact, which has hitherto escaped notice, but which will now meet with universal recognition, that dairy-men, when they take to reading, are generally found to prefer rather a milk-and-water sort of book.

A judge at Montgomery, Alabama, recently interrupted a very flowery young orator with, "Hold on! hold on, my dear Sir! Don't go any higher! You are already out of the jurisdiction of this court."

The ultima thule of surgery has been reached in New Haven, if we may credit a local chronicle, which tells us of a patient there who recently "had a cancer removed from her heart."

"The arrangements of Nature are admirable," exclaimed a young lady, during the late high winds. "The same wind which disarranges our dress blows dust into the eyes of the would-be observers."

An Indiana paper thus politely expresses an opinion of a judge: "He knows just about as much of law as a mule does of mineralogy—the chances being in favor of the mule."

An Ohio clergyman makes the following report of the marriage of a couple:

"The man said, 'Be short! be short!'

"I said, 'Yes, I can do it in three minutes.'

"'That's right,' he said.

"I saw that there was some little dissatisfaction on the part of the other half. I said to her, 'You don't want to have it too short?'

"'No,' she said: 'a body don't want to get herself up so for nothing.'"

A small merchant, who was not of a speculative turn, expressed his objection to marrying a bouncing widow who was of a speculative turn as regards new husbands, and himself in particular. He said if he married her his friends would always call him henceforth "the widow's mite."

Said a young man of medium size
(Quite in proportion was his brain)
To one he wished should think him wise,
And hoped her favor thus to gain:
"Were John the Baptist here below,
What gifts would you have him bestow?"

Upon her lovely speaking face
Disdain and scorn together played.
She answered him with laughing grace—
Nor did she seem at all dismayed:
"His raiment, Sir, of camel's-hair,
And leathern belt with it to wear."

RAMSBOTHAMIANA.—The Dowager Ramsbotham says her grandson is now at the university studying medicine. His course is to draw draughts, and read Cicero's Epidemics in three volumes.

MAN'S LIFE.—Some modern philosopher has given in these eleven lines the summary of life:

7 years in childhood's sport and play	7
7 years in school from day to day	14
7 years at trade or college life	21
7 years to find a place and wife	28
7 years to pleasure's follies given	35
7 years to business hardly driven	42
7 years for some wild-goose chase	49
7 years for wealth and bootless race	56
7 years for hoarding for your heir	63
7 years in weakness spent and care	70

Then die, and go you should know where.

A pleasant bit of arithmetic. The learned author says nothing about seven years' transportation, an idea that ought to have struck him in connection with seven.

A German paper contains a reply from a clergyman who was traveling, and who stopped at a hotel much frequented by wags and jokers. The host, not being used to have a clergyman at his table, looked at him with surprise; the guests used all their artillery of wit upon him without eliciting a remark in self-defense. The worthy clergyman ate his dinner quietly, apparently without observing the gibes and sneers of his neighbors. One of them at last, in despair at his forbearance, said to him:

"Well, I wonder at your patience! Have you not heard all that has been said against you?"

"Oh yes; but I am used to it. Do you know who I am?"

"No, Sir."

"Well, I will inform you—I am chaplain of a lunatic asylum: such remarks have no effect upon me."

MINISTERS OF THE INTERIOR—The cook and the doctor.

An old, rough clergyman once took for his text that passage of the Psalms, "I said in my haste, All men are liars." Looking up apparently as if he saw the Psalmist standing before him, he said: "You said it in your haste, David, did you? Well, if you had been here, you might have said it after mature deliberation."

A LITERARY ANNOUNCEMENT.—In press, Yesterday's Table-Cloth.

An editor, who has been keeping a record of big beets, announces at last that "the beet that beat the beet that beat the other beet is now beaten by a beet that beats all the beets, whether the original beet, the beet that beat the beet, or the beet that beat the beet that beat the beet."

PRECEPT AND EXAMPLE.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER. "Jessie Brown, how often have I told you not to be Late?"

JESSIE. "Which you have, Miss. But, oh dear! I've had such a Job with my 'Air!"

FOLK-LORE AND FASHION.

A sleeping Beauty in the wood,
Now slumbering on her mossy bed,
Would half a yard of chignon good
Have piled aloft upon her head.

On Beauty's crown a hair-rick towers—
A thing of grace, O Christian friends!
Adorned with artificial flowers
And sprigs and shreds and ribbons' ends.

Forms of the smaller fauna, some,
Would in her top-knot find a lair;
The little birds and dormice come
And build and nestle in her hair.

MEDICAL QUERY.—Would inoculation with scarlet fever be a preservative against yellow?

A gentleman passing a country church while under repair, observed to one of the workmen that he thought it would be an expensive job.

"Why, yes," replied the man; "but, in my opinion, we shall accomplish what our minister has endeavored to do for the last thirty years in vain."

"What is that?" said the gentleman.

"Why, bring all the parish to repentance."

A writer in Notes and Queries says: "A bad omen seems to be drawn from an ox or cow breaking into a garden. Though I laugh at the superstition, the omen was painfully fulfilled in my case." Most horticulturists would think it a bad omen—say, to see a cow among some choice tulips.

A gentleman once owned a monkey and a parrot. The distinguishing trait of the former was mischief, of the latter, profanity. Both occupied the same apartment, but, in the interest of peace, the monkey was usually tied up. One night, however, he obtained his freedom, and on the following morning when the master entered the room to look after his pets the scene which met his eye reminded him of a small battle-field. Things were broken, scattered, and generally demoralized. The bird-cage was overturned and empty, and crockery and feathers were strewed on the floor. The monkey was sitting on the top of the wardrobe, with one eye dilapidated, and his generally disconsolate appearance indicating that he might have gone through a first-class pugilistic encounter. The parrot was not to be seen, but his feathers were every where. The owner took in the state of the case at a glance, and calling for "Poll," was astonished to see a denuded bird, naked as the day when he emerged from his shell—not even a pin-feather in place—stalk out from a dark corner, and exclaim, in a woe-begone manner, "Oh! oh! we've had a h— of a time!"

A FAST FRIEND—The telegraph.

An attorney was making a high-flown speech the other day, telling about angels' tears, weeping-willows, and silent tombstones, when his honor said, "Confine your remarks to the dog-fight."

A young lady lately went to a photographic artist, and wished him to take her picture with an expression as if composing a poem.

"One thing," said an old toper, "was never seen coming through the rye, and that's the kind of whisky one gets nowadays."

A MAN IN CHARGE OF A BABY.

"I am going out for a few minutes. If Baby wakes, Amuse him."

Of course Baby wakes up cross.

Dances the Highland Fling with success.

Lets Baby play in the Coal-Scuttle while he cools off.

Thinks Mamma's Portrait may interest him. Baby touches it up a little.

Tries to Wash him.

Rushes out on front stoop to see if Mamma is coming.

Mamma arrives. Papa collapses.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

WITH A SUPPLEMENT.

VOL. VI.—No. 52.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' and Children's Winter Dresses, Figs. 1-5.

Figs. 1 and 3.—GRAY POPLIN DRESS. This dress of gray poplin consists of a skirt and basque-waist, trimmed with puffs and ruffles of the material, and rolls and folds of gros grain of the same color. The folds are embroidered with white silk.

Fig. 2.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD. This blue cashmere dress is trimmed on the bottom with a kilt-pleated ruffle of the material. Batiste blouse with long sleeves. Blue gros grain sash.

Figs. 4 and 5.—BROWN CASHMERE DRESS. The skirt of this dress is trimmed in front with a kilt-pleated flounce and folds of the material, and with folds of velvet of the same color. The back is trimmed with a gathered cashmere flounce. The trimming for the basque-waist consists of cashmere ruffles and velvet folds. Bows of velvet trim the sides of the skirt and front of the waist. Pleated Swiss muslin fraise and under-sleeves.

Fig. 1.—GRAY POPLIN DRESS. BACK.—[See Fig. 3.]

Fig. 2.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 3.—GRAY POPLIN DRESS. FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]

Fig. 4.—BROWN CASHMERE DRESS. FRONT.—[See Fig. 5.]

Fig. 5.—BROWN CASHMERE DRESS. BACK.—[See Fig. 4.]

FIGS. 1-5.—LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S WINTER DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 20 was sent out gratuitously an illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, containing further installments of "GOLDEN GRAIN," "PHINEAS REDUX," and "THE PARISIANS."

Another illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 27.

☞ An EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, with magnificent full-page illustrations, containing the beginning of ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S great Christmas Story, is sent out gratuitously with the present Number.

"HARRY HEATHCOTE OF GANGOIL,"

Another EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, with the continuation of "HARRY HEATHCOTE OF GANGOIL," will be sent out gratuitously with the next Number of the BAZAR.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Boy's Wardrobe, consisting of Sack Overcoat with Cape, Jacket, Vest, Knee Pantaloons, and Knickerbockers, for Boys from 4 to 9 Years old, illustrated on page 821 of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement in previous Numbers.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of a Youth's Wardrobe, consisting of Sack Overcoat, English Sack Coat, Double-breasted Vest, and Pantaloons, will be published with our next Number.

HOUSEHOLD PETS.

IT is a doubtful matter whether the possession of household pets is an advantage or not, and yet it is a possession that has been cherished from time immemorial; and the fine lady who values her poodle, and the spinster with her cat and her parrot, are counterbalanced by the savage who has caught and kept his little fox, and by the Oriental monarch whose tame tigers tumble at the foot of his throne. Nor has the taste varied much in generations. The Venetian girl's rose-billed lory was as charming a pet as the shrill-voiced canary that clatters cheerfully in all our halls to-day; and it is only since the beginning of the present century that the dwarf and the negro, without whom no mediæval house of distinction was complete, have lost their ascendency, the one because civilization has outstripped the point of cultivating deformity, and the other because the negro has ceased to be uncommon, although but a few years since, as we lately heard, a colored person of one of our Northern cities, chancing to make a Russian voyage, was so fortunate as to attract the covetousness of the imperial family, and came back to Portsmouth for his wife, decked out in gold-lace and feathers, and returned to pass the rest of his days behind the emperor's chair.

Yet grotesque and almost vulgar as such a taste in pets would seem to be, we can quite match it out of some of the pleasantest life of to-day. We shudder at the > "gorgeous snake

> The Roman girls were wont of old,
> When Rome there was, for coolness' sake,
> To let lie curling o'er their bosoms," but forget that the pine-snake, whose white body with its black stains grows to the length of eight feet, is a not infrequent and authorized inmate of the houses of the region where it is found; and there are more than a few young ladies in our proudest cities whose fashionable favorite is a baby alligator—a pretty piece of animated bronze when in its infantile state, and a curiously inexpensive favorite, since it is said to live contentedly on no other food than pine knots. There are, however, exceptional and individual pets, such as the spider to which the captive played his flute, and the weed that beguiled another captive's confinement, which have acquired, as one might say, a historical character; and in all ages there have been those on which the owners have displayed their idiosyncrasies—here a monkey, and there a mouse, a pig, a flea, a cockerel, a quail; and to-day we read of an old lady who leaves a legacy to the numberless cats about her hearth; and yesterday the entomological books dealt with the gentleman who on no account would suffer his servants to destroy that disgusting vermin from which most of us recoil as from a creature of night and filth, and one specimen of which a distinguished preacher, staying overnight at an unclean inn, is said to have transfixed with a pin on the open hotel Bible at the verse, "And every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth shall be an abomination." But all these incidents are only abnormal freaks of a natural tendency—a desire in these to lavish love, an impossibility not to lavish it; an overflowing pity in those and warmth of heart; a necessity in others of being loved by some one thing.

And certainly there are few people of lively feelings to whom the devotion of a household pet is not a temptation; for the human affections are like those playthings of moistened leather called suckers, which, once applied, cling inseparably, and with which we see the boys lift even stones from the ground. Seldom can any unfortunate or desolate little creature come within their sphere but they cling to it presently almost as if it were a part of themselves. We frequently see the poorest people, who, thin and pinched as they are, have yet a bone to spare for their thin and pinched dog; and be they murderers or be they thieves, there is one creature in the world that turns to them, and whose heart they can make glad.

The more love expends itself the more it grows. The person who has a child gives it a dumb pet, and the person who has one pet usually adds another, and love leavens the whole. The animals themselves recognize that they are members of one family, and live sometimes on better terms with each other than the human members do. It was Dr. GOOD, we think, who told of the cat that seized the escaped bird, unhurt, in its mouth, and leaped out of reach with it when a strange cat entered the room; and we ourselves have often seen in a private house, where no instruction of the sort had been given, the cat, the dog, and the parrot eating contentedly out of the same dish.

There are few things so pathetic as the love of these creatures for their protectors. It is the devotion of a faithful nature, shut up in darkness, toward a superior being. The dog's master stands to him for a god, and he himself is at once slave, friend, and worshiper. Nobody can read the account of DICKENS'S dogs welcoming him back to Gadshill from America—the great St. Bernard fondling his feet and weeping over them—without wishing for dogs of his own to welcome him as eagerly.

The house where pets are made much of is usually a cheerful house—not only because they help to make it so, but because, as their presence indicates, kindness and gentleness and all the elements of a happy home are to be met there. The great silken-eared setters greet you hospitably at the gate; far is suspicion from their noble nature; they accompany you to the door; and as it opens, the trill of bird-song gives suggestion of summer and flowers and sunshine, though it be the dreariest day of November; the cat, asleep on her cushion, does not open an eye at you; but the little Spitz in the window bristles up inquiringly to know if it be a trustworthy friend of the house, like the faultless watch-dog that he is; and far away in the region of the kitchen poor Poll's infectious laugh is heard: and you can not help feeling that here is a place where warm hearts and genuine natures keep a little corner of the world fresh and sweet.

There are some famous people of whom we can not think without seeing their favorites beside them: EMILY BRONTÈ and her huge dog, Sir WALTER SCOTT and his Maida, SCARLATTI and his cat, King CHARLES and his spaniel; and we have sometimes felt it to be an extenuating circumstance in that royal scamp's account that he knew the spaniel's beauty when he saw it, and had the grace to love it.

We think there is nothing more senseless than the objection so often urged against household pets that they are things to be pampered while there are children starving in highways and by-ways. Certainly one must prevent all the children from starving that may be in one's power, and by no means give their bread to dogs; but how far will the pet's small bite and sup go toward keeping a single child from starving? One's time, too, may be so occupied that the adoption or the caring for a child, however desirable, is out of the question. It would be impossible, perhaps, to give it a part of the attention that either its body or its soul requires, while the Blenheim or the Angora require no time whatever, and are always there to be caressed in the spare instant. A dog, says some one, is like a perpetual baby in the house; he never grows up, and he never tells tales. But in all reasonable likelihood, the starving child, when it comes along, will receive the best treatment in a house where pets are the order of the day; for it has been our experience to observe that it is only the narrow and selfish hearts that have no room for pets, and that about the fireside there is always something desirable to be found in the character of that one whom the dog and the cat have chosen for their friend.

But, as we said in the beginning, it is doubtful if the possession of these pets is an advantage, despite the pleasure they give. For presently they grow old, and presently they suffer; and there are few people who acknowledge the righteousness of your affection for them, or spare your feelings. When the little creatures in some cruel extremity look up to you for help, it does not add to your happiness to think you can not give it. When your little Gyp, who seems to you almost like a human being, with his bright and frolicking intelligence, becomes the prey of the policeman, you forget TENNYSON'S "Better to have loved and lost," and wish you had never had Gyp at all, and find it no consolation to declare that in this age of chloroform the man who drops poisoned meat about for dogs is by far the greater brute of the two. The pain, of course, in such instances is neither vital nor severe, but you would have avoided it altogether by not having possessed its first cause, and there is enough inevitable pain in the world, it would seem, without going about to gather it in. "If I have no children to make me laugh, I've none to make me cry," said a good old doctor whom we knew; and correspondingly if you have no pets to help make your house gay, you have none whose maiming, abstraction, and death can help to make it gloomy. For let there be any misfortune hovering over a house, and let so trifling a thing happen as the finding of a canary with his feet upturned, and his song frozen in his throat, and that trifle brings "death into the world and all our woe," accents the previous trouble, gives a deeper shadow to the day, and for a brief while makes the earth seem a place of little but death and destruction.

WHO IS WHO?

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

A BRAVE and knightly gentleman of fourscore and fourteen years held in his arms a tiny maiden of not one-twentieth so many months. He gazed into her blue steadfast eyes, caressed the silky brown shadow that was fondly called her hair, patted the soft curvature of her cheeks and the dimpled shining shoulders, and said, half musingly and mournfully, looking backward, half tenderly and lovingly, looking forward, "It is Katy; surely it is Katy, plain to see."

Now Katy has been in her grave these eighty years.

Eighty years ago Katy, beloved daughter and sister, in the fresh full bloom of happy girlhood, paled and faded before the eyes that wept to see, sank away from the hands that could not hold her, disappeared from a world that did not miss her, to live only and for evermore in hearts whose world was desolated by her going.

Over that forgotten and unforgotten grave eighty rolling years have fled. Nearly every form that trod the earth that day sleeps this day beneath it. That generation has lapsed into a silence never to be broken. What they thought and hoped, and planned and loved, all that they longed for and worked for and dreaded, to all they are alike indifferent. Beaming eye and listening ear and throbbing heart, sturdy strength of sinew, tint of lip and cheek—the earth has ingulfed them all. They exist no more but in the sleeping daisy and the lightly falling snow. But out of the snows of eighty winters and the daisies of eighty summers, by what magic art I know not, little maid Margaret has gathered the eye's light and the lip's curve, and the chin's dimple and the cheek's contour of little Great-great-aunt Katy, who gave them into earth's keeping now these fourscore years ago.

Behold, I show you a mystery! But I only show it. I can not explain it. Who can? None, surely, but He who instituted it. What is that wonderful, that incomprehensible law of succession, of inheritance, of transmission, by which qualities, traits, features, go down from father to son, from great-uncle to grand-nephew, from remote ancestor to unseen offspring? We are so used to it that we are not surprised; but it is, nevertheless, one of the most hidden of secrets. There is some law, but we have not begun to grasp it. That a child should resemble its parents we can almost persuade ourselves that we understand. Love, we know, nay, even association, but love, surely and strongly, moulds even maturity into harmony and even into resemblance. The husband and wife, born and reared far from each other under circumstances and in a society totally diverse, do sometimes, it is said, come to resemble each other. That abounding mutual attraction which drew them together makes them one in hope and love and purpose and sympathy and heart's desire, and brings presently oneness of expression and feature. This we may fancy that we understand. The children are stamped with the image that each cherishes most fondly. This, too, is not wholly incomprehensible. But, even here, why does one child resemble the father and one the mother, and why is a third totally unlike both? We only pluck at the skirts of a mystery, and it evades us. And why should this boy have the petulance and passion, the temperament and even the manners, of a great-uncle whom neither his father nor his mother ever saw, who died in early manhood, and of all the living is remembered now and recalled only by his sister, who sees him reproduced in this little grandson after sixty years of silence and seclusion? Obedient to what mandate did maid Margaret look through Katy's eyes and smile with Katy's lips so loyally that Floyd went back through all his bitter, busy years, back through his soft Indian summer and his rich harvest-time and the sweet spring sunlight, to his bright boyhood and his young sister's promise? Why do children and children's children go their separate ways to the ends of the earth, marry out and out, grow bronzed by foreign suns and foreign blood, to be in some remote spot recognized as kindred by an alien and a stranger through some peculiar quivering of the eyelid or some singular remembered cadence of the voice? By what law came that eyelid to quiver, that voice to resound through the intermingling and fusion, not to say confusion, of years and zones and families? Why does that one resemblance strain through a thousand differences, and why does it alight only on three or four, and shun the three or four score who have equal claim to its favor?

Are the few resemblances we recognize not to be compared to the many which we inherit from forgotten forefathers? Is it that every trick of feature and trait of character belonged first to some ancestor, only there is no one to tell us who he was? Are we but eclecticism and conglomeration, a mere second and third hand article—the disjecta membra of past generations? Does nature mock us? With all our pain and toil and eager endeavor, with all our anguish and anger, ambition and hatred, and hope and love, are we but treading, after all, the old dull round of things? Has all this mortal agony and unutterable bliss of birth and love and life and death resulted only in this, that what was Katy once is Margaret now—that a man is simply his grandfather? Then why not let Katy keep on living? Why not let the grandfather stay grandfather? Why should nature be at the pains of so many processes to make three generations, when it would seem that one generation would answer the same purpose with a great deal less trouble? Why did not nature hold out as she began,

> "When ADAM lived nine hundred years,
> METHUSELAH still more;
> When ENOCH very old appears—
> SETH, ABRAHAM, and NOAH?"

And yet these cases may not be at all to the point. I do not know that the children of these old patriarchs and their grandchildren and their great-grandchildren were any more original than the offspring of their short-lived descendants. Doubtless as EVE dandled little LAMECH upon her knees she delighted to see and to point out that in his forehead he favored METHUSAEL, and that he had MEHUJAEL'S nose, and IRAD'S eyes, and the bonnie brown hair of ENOCH, and then, with a deep sigh, she would skip a generation, and declare that by his sturdy tread and erect little figure you might know him the wide world through for ADAM'S own grandson! We do not, then, strictly speaking, inherit traits. We are simply made with like tendencies. Margaret has nothing that Katy ever held, but through some remote, deep-buried law of likeness, out of the dew and blossom of the earth she gathers such a loveliness of outline and color as Katy drew from the young world of hers. Though Katy had lived on till now, Margaret would have had her eyes and hair all the same.

Hosted by Google

At any rate, I am glad that no new order of things was established before my day. I humbly admit that I may have given the world much trouble; still I would a great deal rather be alive myself than to have some great-great-grandfather still walking around, and me only a buttercup or a snow-bank!

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BOYS' CLOTHING.

THE suit of boys' clothing illustrated this week, and of which cut paper patterns are published, is intended for the first trowsers suit, which is put on at the age of four or five years, and is appropriate in style as long as knee pantaloons are worn. This suit is one of the most popular of the English designs now in vogue, and consists of an easy-fitting English jacket, with the "real" vest so coveted by little boys, and close, snugly fitting knee pantaloons, that display well-rounded limbs to advantage, and are not clumsy, as were the full pleated garments formerly worn. The jacket extends well over the hips, and fits there smoothly; its back seams are wide apart at the waist in true English fashion; the shoulders are short and jaunty, with sleeves projecting slightly above the armhole, while the front has a pretty revers collar turned back to disclose the high vest underneath. The vest is buttoned up closely, and merely bound all around. For very short, chubby little fellows a sham vest is sometimes preferred; it is sewed to the jacket, and the fronts of the jacket are very much sloped toward the buttons to display the vest, which is there cut in two sharp points. The knee pantaloons follow the outlines of the limbs perfectly, being just loose enough for ease, and fitting too closely to wrinkle or look clumsy. From three to six buttons are set on the outside seam above the knee. These suits are made of dark blue, brown, or green cloth, either with plain surface or else with almost invisible diagonal or straight lines. Brown suits are considered especially stylish, but dark blue, which is really dark enough to be called blue-black, is the popular color. The most stylish suits are made very plainly, a wide binding with one row of Prussian braid being all that is necessary in the way of ornament; other suits have a row of wide braid with one of narrow soutache above it—the latter either straight or curled—put on around the garment plainly, with little fanciful designs at the corners, on the sleeves, and in front. Blue steel, silver, and gilt buttons are all used, but a repped or twill button of silk and worsted of the color of the cloth is in better taste. Every-day suits are made in the same fashion of various gray cloths, and of checked, striped, and invisible plaids of white and black combined. Tailors charge from $10 to $24 for English suits. The shirt waists worn with these suits, and to which the pantaloons are buttoned, is an ordinary pleated blouse-waist with turned-over collar, shirt sleeves, and a belt. Bright scarlet or blue worsted long stockings, gartered above the knee, or held up by an elastic band hanging from the belt, complete the suit; the balmoral stockings, with colored stripes around the leg, are also worn. The shoes are half-high Polish buttoned boots, with thick projecting soles and low broad heels. The hat is an Alpine felt with indented crown, or else a fanciful seal-skin turban. An extra pattern of full knickerbocker trowsers gathered around the leg is furnished with this suit, as many mothers prefer them for slender boys, and to give variety to their clothing.

The overcoat is of simple shape, with an air of style and comfort about it. It is a long, single-breasted sack, made with a fly front, pockets in abundance, and a small turned-over collar, which may be of velvet or of the cloth. The round cape is very deep, and should not be permanently fastened to the coat, as it is only worn in midwinter. A row of silk braid or binding is the best finish for its edge. Blue-black cloth of plain surface is the material most used, though occasionally the rough chinchilla cloths and fur beavers are chosen. These overcoats at the furnishing houses cost from $10 to $27, according to size and quality.

PARISIAN BLACK COSTUMES FOR LADIES.

French correspondents write that the fancy for the universally becoming black toilettes increases in Paris, instead of being on the wane, and that Worth and Pingat rival each other in the extravagance and elegance of their black dresses and mantles. For the street they prepare black silk and velvet suits with skirts that are plain and flat in front, while the back is trimmed with flounces alternately of velvet and silk. Above this is worn a velvet casaque with a short basque behind, and deeply pointed front, or else with long square basques in front. This casaque is edged with jet fringe; the revers and cuffs appear to be of solid jet, and there are strips of jet galloon the entire length of the sleeves. Other velvet casaques are without jet, but are bordered with silver-fox fur. For the house, on dressy occasions, there are also elegant black silk dresses made in the Medicis style, and glittering with fine jet beads cut in many small facets. For full-dress dinners there are black tulle dresses made over silk, and trimmed with the new embroidered laces. These dresses are usually all black, but young ladies prefer for trimming the gay embroideries of scarlet poppies or moss-rose wreaths wrought in net and applied to the dress. Steel beads mixed with black embroidery are very effective in the evening, and there is also an effort to introduce gilt passementerie on black ball dresses. Needle-work in the brilliant India colors is done on black Sicilienne cloth over dresses, and on velvet wraps for the opera. Other black wraps of cashmere or Sicilienne are nearly covered with soutache in which steel or jet beads are introduced, and the garment is edged with heavy fringe and a ruche of curled ostrich feathers. Casaques, mantillas, sacques, and Dolmans of this kind are all imported, costing from $150 to $300.

TOYS FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

The shops are gay with Christmas toys notwithstanding the panic, but in consequence of hard times there is a great reduction in the prices of toys and all fancy goods this season. For the little girls there are wax dolls of endless variety, far prettier than the old-fashioned china dolls, and at all prices, beginning as low as 25 cents, and ending with the life-size doll brought from the Vienna Exposition, and valued at $150. Wax dolls at 25 cents represent bald-headed infants in cap and night slip, while those with real hair, or something that closely imitates it, are sold as low as 45 cents, and others, that open and shut their eyes, may be bought for 60 cents. French bisque dolls, with moving heads, cost all the way from 75 cents to $5. The more expensive dolls have real eyebrows and lashes, and hair that may be combed and braided, and tiny hair-pins are shown for fastening it up. The handsomest Roman wax dolls are jointed in every limb, even the wrists and ankles moving freely. Blonde beauties with violet eyes are still the favorite dolls, but they are rivaled this winter by Roman faces with Titian red hair, and Spanish maidens, whose raven tresses are braided in coronets, and ornamented with drooping crimson roses. A bisque doll in bridal array of white satin, lace veil, and pearls is marked $25; other dolls, dressed as characters in well-known operas, are miniature effigies of Patti, Lucca, and Nilsson. Boy dolls are largely imported, with short hair parted on one side, and pretty little sailor or English suits of clothes. It is amusing to look over the furnishing department for dolls, where every thing in the way of an outfit is prepared, from a tooth-brush to a set of jewelry! Patterns for doll clothes similar to those furnished in the Bazar Supplements are arranged in boxes, marked "Dollie's Trousseau," and are varied in size to suit dolls of all lengths.

The mechanical toys are very handsome this winter. One marked $50 is a comical monkey arrayed in Louis XIV. costume, with powdered wig and laces, seated at a harp, upon which he seems to play; while he nods his head wisely and opens his huge mouth, the music-box below plays lively French airs. Another novelty is a peacock with gorgeous plumage of real feathers, that upon being wound up, struts up and down the room, raising and lowering his tail, and moving his head from side to side. Another is a gayly dressed troubadour, who bows politely, and strokes with his fingers the strings of a guitar for which the box beneath supplies the music. An elegantly dressed ballet-dancer pirouettes on one toe around a toy parlor to the sound of similar music. Still another musical toy represents a lady seated at a piano moving her fingers over the keys, while a foreign-looking professor stands beside her and beats time as she plays. Among inexpensive mechanical toys is a doll's sewing-machine that is regularly threaded, and will sew after a fashion: price $2. At the same price is a gayly dressed Scotchman, who dances the Highland fling, and provides the music also, after being wound up. There are, besides, many other dancers dressed as sailors, negroes, and tight-rope performers.

A curious toy is a skinny-looking rooster made of some thin membrane gayly painted, which, on being inflated, swells to an enormous size, then crows very naturally as the wind escapes, and he sinks back to his original proportions. A doll made of the same material, and looking like the merest rag, is inflated to the size of a giantess, and utters lamentable cries as she collapses. Among instructive toys boys with mechanical genius will be delighted with the new improved locomotives with tenders, valves, whistle, and every thing perfect. These cost from $12 to $40. There are also steam fire-engines with hose that throw a stream four feet high: the prices range from $4 25 to $4 80. For both boys and girls there are German boxes of wooden butterflies, of twenty or thirty varieties, painted, and labeled with their specific names; unpainted butterflies and paints are then furnished for the child to make copies. A box of comic paper figures representing the cries of Paris, has the faces cut out of the heads, and the child must learn to place them properly. The "Little Flower-maker" is a box of materials for artificial flowers, with models and instructions for making them. For the boys are little chests marked the "Clever Carpenter," the "Ship-builder," etc., containing tools, designs, and instructions. The German architectural boxes, with colored woods for building, are far more tasteful and intricate than when first introduced.

Menageries are displayed with performing animals that come out of their cages and dance under direction of a showman: price $19. Smaller menageries and Noah's Arks have jointed wooden animals not easily broken, and may be bought separately. More expensive animals, sold singly, have natural skins, and are perfectly shaped. There are spotted horses, Shetland ponies, and shaggy lions, each for $6. A lamb as large as life, with snowy fleece, a blue ribbon and bell around its neck, turns its head and bleats most piteously: all for $8. Shaggy poodles, marked $4 25, open their mouths, but happily do not snarl or bark. For $6 is a meek-looking cow that turns its head and lows, and may also be milked, provided some milk is poured down its back.

Among the new games is dice croquet for the parlor, interesting to grown-up children as well as to the little folks. The jugglers' tricks once so costly are now made at less expense. A box furnished with every thing necessary for the several games of chess, backgammon, draughts, dominoes, cribbage, whist, and bézique is sold for $36.

VARIETIES.

For the boys are guns of every description—popguns, shot-guns, needle-guns, Chassepots, and mitrailleuses—costing from 38 cents to $3 75 each. Drums of tiniest size are 20 cents, and these range up to $5 for bass drums. Hobby-horses begin with small painted wooden ones on rockers at $5, and increase to the large springing ponies covered with natural skins, worth from $18 to $25. Rocking-horses with chairs for girls cost from $1 50 to $3.

The Christmas-tree ornaments are prettier than ever. For the foot of the tree is a new Santa Claus, with longer, whiter beard than the old fellow generally wears, and also female figures distributing gifts; for the top are flying angels—cheap little angels for 25 cents, and gay, gorgeous seraphim for $2 50 each. The fruits are transparent and natural-looking—great clusters of grapes, white, red, and purple, bunches of cherries, and currants. Chinese lanterns of brightest-colored papers cost from 12 cents to $1 45 each; and there are bright tin reflectors of every possible shape, crystal and glass tubes of every color, with jumping-jacks and pendent figures bounding up and down from rubber strings.

For information received thanks are due, for boys' clothing and ladies' dresses, to Messrs. BROOKS BROTHERS; and A. T. STEWART & Co.; and for toys, to EHRICH'S Temple of Fashion; LORD & TAYLOR; and STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER.

PERSONAL.

THE friends of the eminent author Monsieur C. HIPPEAU, of Paris, who visited this country in 1869, under the auspices of the French Ministry of Public Instruction, to report on the condition of American schools, and who afterward published an exhaustive work on the subject, will be grieved to hear that his daughter, Mrs. THOMAS HAMMOND, of Crown Point, New York, with her husband and three children, all went down in the ill-fated Ville du Havre. Mrs. HAMMOND was a lady of lovely character and rare accomplishments, and her loss, with that of her husband, will be widely felt in the community where they belonged. Mr. HAMMOND was a wealthy and influential resident of Crown Point, and, with his brother JOHN, owned extensive iron works and mines in the northern part of this State. Mrs. HAMMOND had not revisited her native land since her marriage. She was on the way to spend the winter with her father in Paris, and to meet her only sister, Mrs. JAMES S. MERRIAM, of New York, who has been in Europe several months for the improvement of her health. Mr. MERRIAM had intended to accompany the party, but becoming impatient to rejoin his family, sailed a few weeks ago, and thus escaped being involved in their destruction. The state-room of the HAMMOND family was on the port side of the vessel, which was struck by the Loch Earn, and probably they met with a mercifully swift death. It is a question if they were not happier in thus sharing a common fate than if one had been left to suffer the tortures of memory during the rest of a broken life.

—DANIEL BOONE, though not "a man of the prima facie class," in a literary point of view, was nevertheless a zealous man and a good man and an accurate surveyor, as may be inferred from the following verbatim statement made by himself:

"June 14, 1791. Laide for WILLIAM ALLEN ten acres of Land Situate on the South Este Side of Cruked Crik in the county of Konhawwba and bounded as follows viz Beginning at a red oke and Hickury thence North 56 West 23 poles to a stake thence South 34 West 58 poles to the beginning. DANIEL BOONE."

—What are we to say about Mrs. LUCY CARNEY, a colored woman of Battle Creek, Michigan, who is one hundred and twelve years old, and recollects the battle of Monmouth, in which she saw a party of British dragoons chasing a squad of Continentals? Late in life she was taken to Ohio and given her liberty. But the particular point about the old party is that she drinks unlimited tea, and has always used tobacco.

—Another Swedish nightingale has been discovered—MARTHA ERICSSON, a servant-girl of Stockholm. Her voice is said to be so marvelous as to point her out as a future rival to NILSSON, PATTI, and the rest of them.

—There is a laudable desire to know who is the lady of this city mentioned by the New York correspondent of the Troy Press as being "author, doctor, artist, and actress, and who has won success in each of the four professions. After breakfast in the morning she will write for a couple hours on her story or essay for the periodical that employs her. From ten to two she practices medicine, and receives patients in her office. She then works at her easel as a painter till six, and makes pretty pictures, which always find ready sale. After dinner and an hour's rest she will go to the theatre at which she is engaged, and play the part for which she may be set down in the cast. Did any body ever know a man who could do any thing like this? Besides all, she is accomplished in the pretty feminine arts, knows how to make her own clothes, and is the mother of robust boys." Who is this versatile genius and very practical woman?

—A gentleman who recently attended divine service at the little parish church of Crathie on a communion Sunday relates how the Queen of England joined in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in that Scotch Presbyterian church. "At the commencement of the communion service her Majesty and ladies left the royal pew, walked down stairs, and entered Dr. TAYLOR'S seat, which was covered as a communion-table, and partook of the elements of the Lord's Supper. Dr. ROBERTSON, being ruling elder of the church, attended on her Majesty and party, the Queen handing him her token along with the other ladies. Dr. TAYLOR, the minister of Crathie, took a piece of the bread, broke it, handed a piece first to the Rev. Mr. COWAN, his assistant for the day, and then to the Queen, out of his hand, and then handed her the cup. Her Majesty kept her seat until the two verses of the 103d Psalm were sung, after Dr. TAYLOR had addressed the communicants, when her Majesty left for the palace."

—Miss ANTOINETTE STERLING, one of the finest contraltos this country has produced, is singing with great success at the London Covent Garden concerts.

—JOHN T. FORD last week conveyed to the United States, for $100,000, the old theatre building in which President LINCOLN was assassinated.

—Certain historical associations were revived at Alexandria, Virginia, on the 20th of November, at the celebration of Christ Church centennial. General WASHINGTON was a member of the first vestry of the parish, and for a long while one of its leading members. In this church also General ROBERT E. LEE was confirmed and served as a vestryman. One relic has been carefully preserved, namely, the Bible which was once the property of General WASHINGTON, and was presented to the church by GEORGE WASHINGTON PARKE CUSTIS. The pew which was once owned by the Father of his Country has not been entirely shorn of its original greatness, for it is still one of those old-fashioned large square boxes so rarely seen nowadays. The old parish register is a curiosity. It contains some of the quaintest expressions, and has numerous allusions to the customs of pre-revolutionary times; in fact, until 1789, many civil affairs seem to have come under the jurisdiction of the vestry, such as imposing fines for killing deer out of season, apprenticing children, punishing Sabbath-breakers, etc. The seats in the church were allotted to the parishioners according to their dignity, until the disestablishment, after which the church was supported by voluntary contributions. General WASHINGTON was one of the foremost to set a good example in this respect. He was already a pew-owner, having paid £36 10*s.* for his pew soon after the church was erected.

—There are two elderly ladies living near Newport, Kentucky, named TRUESDELL, and aged respectively eighty-eight and seventy years, who own 600 acres of land, and cultivate a large portion, doing nearly all the work themselves. They say if they were not poor they would move to the city and live at their ease. Their land is all very fine, and worth at least $50 an acre, consequently their poverty consists in being worth $30,000.

—A private letter from Rome, dated November 2, published in the Evening Post, gives the following account of a curious interview between two noted personages:

"JOAQUIN MILLER, the Oregon poet, was here yesterday, and I requested a friend to present him to Miss HOSMER, the sculptor. The interview was thus described to me: When the studio was reached Miss HOSMER appeared on the threshold to receive her guests. After the presentation, without making the usual salutations, MILLER stopped short, and in his peculiar manner examined curiously his hostess, and then blurted, 'HOSMER, I like your eye.' The circuit of the studio was then begun. MILLER had but little to say until the party approached a fine statue, around the base of which were two serpents, twined around one another. These he regarded intently, exclaiming, 'HOSMER, I'm a savage. I don't know much about your beautiful forms and figures, but I do know what a serpent is like; and dern me if they ain't the best I ever saw.' The last statue was some beautiful ideal affair of Miss HOSMER'S. This seemed to attract the poet immensely, for after a long stare he ejaculated, gazing upon the marble, 'HOSMER, you're a great man!' It is needless to say that our gifted countrywoman prizes highly the rough but sincere and complimentary criticism."

—The Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, in one of his late lecture-room talks, illustrated the impossibility of interpreting Divine Providence by comparing himself with his brother CHARLES, who, he said, was his twin in every thing but birth. CHARLES had a better head than his brother, and promised to make a shrewder man. But somehow if an accident happened to any body, it was sure to be to CHARLES. It was CHARLES that broke his leg, that had a white swelling on his knee, that was blown up with gunpowder, that fell down stairs and cut a gash in his cheek, and then, as if symmetry was needed, fell down and cut the other one. He grew up, and had a lovely family. His oldest son was shot in the rebellion, hobbled back, and was shot again, and then went into the regular army. On the border he was surrounded by Indians and killed, and the Judgment-day will have to search all over the plains for his bones. His own boy, on the contrary, went through the war, and came out with only a bruise. His brother CHARLES had two daughters. They went sailing on a lake in the very sight of his house, and were drowned. All this was a mystery to Mr. BEECHER, but it was only left for him to believe blindly, implicitly, in the overruling wisdom and justice of Divine Providence.

—It is reported that the post of French minister at Washington has been tendered to M. FOURNIER, and that the Marquis de Noailles will be transferred to Rome.

—Speaking of "blue Presbyterians," the New York Evangelist thus speaks of the origin of the application of that term in a denominational way: "Some contend that it originated from the blue flag carried by the Presbyterian forces, or the blue watch-fires of the Covenanters. But Dean STANLEY, in his lectures on the history of the Church of Scotland, says: 'The distinct dress of the Scotch Presbyterian clergy was a blue gown and a broad blue bonnet. The Episcopalian clergy, on the other hand, either wore no distinctive dress in public services, or else wore a black gown. From this arose the contrasting epithets of "Black Prelacy" and "True Blue Presbyterianism." Several of our ministers in this city wear very dark blue gowns.' Query: Could the Dean of Canterbury, after his irregular fraternizing with our Presbyterian brethren, be fairly described as 'black and blue?'"

—The Emperor WILLIAM holds rigidly to the sentiment expressed two years ago at Constance, Switzerland, and reiterated in his late reply to the Pope's letter. Two years ago he said, "I have entered on the inheritance of the old emperors, but I will never lead a pope's horse by the bridle." While the Emperor spoke he was in the council-hall and looking at a fresco painting of a triumphal procession, in which the Emperor SIGISMUND is represented as leading Pope MARTIN'S horse.

—The late Sir HENRY HOLLAND, who died recently at eighty-five, was one of the very few men living who had dined with SHERIDAN and been intimate with BYRON. At a party once given by DICKENS he said that he had played whist with TALLEYRAND, and, when quite a child, had seen General WASHINGTON.

Hosted by Google

Ladies' Caps, Figs. 1–3.

Fig. 1.—TULLE CAP WITH PINK VELVET RIBBON. This cap of figured black tulle is trimmed with black lace two inches wide and white blonde an inch and three-quarters wide, and with loops and ends of pink velvet ribbon an inch and seven-eighths wide.

Fig. 2.—TULLE AND LACE CAP WITH GREEN GROS GRAIN RIBBON. This cap is arranged on a foundation of stiff lace, of figured black tulle, white blonde an inch and three-quarters and two inches wide, and loops and ends of green gros grain ribbon three inches wide.

Fig. 3.—SWISS MUSLIN AND LACE CAP WITH BLUE RIBBON. The trimming for this cap of plain white Swiss muslin consists of box-pleated ruffles of the material, lace insertion an inch wide, lace of the same width, and bows of blue velvet ribbon and gros grain ribbon of the same color.

Fig. 1.—TULLE CAP WITH PINK VELVET RIBBON.

Fig. 2.—TULLE AND LACE CAP WITH GREEN GROS GRAIN RIBBON.

Ladies' Winter Cloaks, Figs. 1–4.

Figs. 1 and 4.—STEEL BLUE BEAVER CLOTH CLOAK. The trimming for this cloak of steel blue beaver cloth consists of a binding and folds of black gros grain, braiding of black silk cord, twisted silk fringe, passementerie buttons, and cord bands.

Figs. 2 and 3.—OLIVE GREEN DIAGONAL CLOTH CLOAK. This cloak of olive green diagonal cloth is trimmed with ruches of black gros grain and with strips of black marten.

Ladies' Collarettes and Sleeves, Figs. 1–6.

See illustrations on page 821.

Figs. 1–3.—CRÊPE LISSE AND LACE COLLARETTE AND SLEEVES. The foundation of this collarette consists of two bias strips of double crêpe lisse, each nineteen inches and a quarter long and an inch and a half wide, which are sloped off on one end from the bottom toward the top to a length of eighteen inches and three-quarters. On the under edge they are rounded off from the back (sloped) edge toward the front edge. Edge each of these parts on the top with a side-pleated crêpe lisse ruffle an inch and a quarter wide. The remaining part of the pieces is covered with pleated crêpe lisse. The parts of the collarette after being covered in this manner are sewed up in the middle of the back, and trimmed with gathered Bruges lace two inches and three-quarters wide. Fig. 3 shows a full-sized section of the lace. Fig. 2 shows the sleeve to match the collarette. For this sleeve cut of Swiss muslin a straight piece ten inches long and fifteen inches and a quarter wide, sew up the sides, and hem the upper edge narrow. Gather the under edge of the sleeve to a width of nine inches and three-quarters, and join it with a crêpe lisse ruffle. This ruffle consists of a strip nineteen inches and a quarter long, three inches and a half wide in the middle, and two inches and a quarter wide on the sides, which is run in narrow tucks on the under edge, and bordered with lace. The ends of the strip are sewed together, and the upper edge is gathered to suit the width of the sleeves.

Figs. 4–6.—TULLE COLLARETTE AND SLEEVES, WITH CROCHET GIMP EDGING. The collarette and sleeves are made of plain tulle. The trimming consists of an edging in crochet gimp. Arrange the foundation of the collar and sleeves by the description of the crêpe lisse collar and sleeves, Figs. 1 and 3. The crochet gimp edging, which borders the under edge of the collar and sleeves, is worked with fine white thread in two parts in the following manner: First work on a metal needle, or coarse hair-pin, three pieces of gimp by the description given of Fig. 4, page 293, Harper's Bazar, No. 19, Vol. VI. This gimp has long loops on one side and short loops on the other side. Join two of the finished pieces of gimp on the sides furnished with short loops with one round, * fastening together the next two loops on the first piece of gimp with 1 sc. (single crochet), then work 3 ch. (chain stitch), fasten together the next two loops of the second piece of gimp with 1 sc. and 3 ch.; repeat from *. On the sides furnished with long loops of these two pieces of gimp crochet one round each as follows: Always alternately twist the next loop twice with the cro-

Fig. 3.—SWISS MUSLIN AND LACE CAP WITH BLUE RIBBON.

Fig. 1.—STEEL BLUE BEAVER CLOTH CLOAK.—BACK.—[See Fig. 4.]

Fig. 2.—OLIVE GREEN DIAGONAL CLOTH CLOAK.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 3.]

Fig. 3.—OLIVE GREEN DIAGONAL CLOTH CLOAK.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]

Fig. 4.—STEEL BLUE BEAVER CLOTH CLOAK.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]

FIGS. 1–4.—LADIES' WINTER CLOAKS.

Hosted by Google

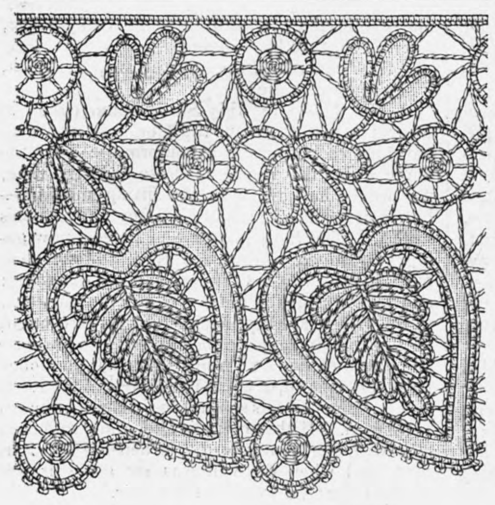

Fig. 3.—BRUGES LACE EDGING.—[See Figs. 1 and 2.]

Fig. 1.—CRÊPE LISSE AND LACE COLLARETTE. [See Figs. 2 and 3.]

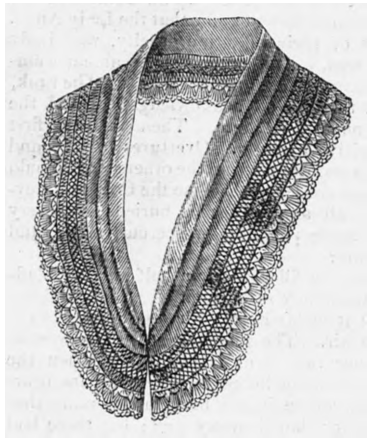

Fig. 4.—TULLE COLLARETTE WITH CROCHET GIMP EDGING. [See Figs. 5 and 6.]

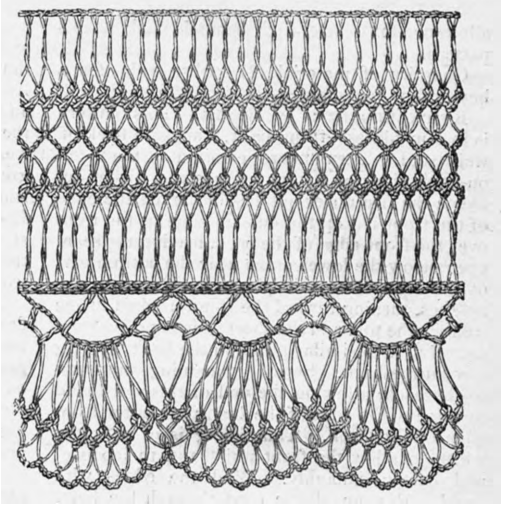

Fig. 6.—CROCHET GIMP EDGING.—[See Figs. 4 and 5.]

chet needle, work 1 sc. on this loop, then 1 ch. This completes one part of the edging. Now take the third piece of gimp, and for the under edge of the edging work, first, on the side furnished with the long loops, two rounds as follows: 1st round.—* Of the next two loops side by side lay the first loop over the second, and on both loops crochet 4 dc. (double crochet) separated each by 4 ch., 1 ch., 7 sc. on the next 7 loops twisted once with the crochet needle, then 1 ch.; repeat from . 2d round.— 1 sc. on the next middle 4 ch. worked always between 2 dc. in the preceding round, 7 ch., 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the next single ch. before the following 7 sc. in the preceding round, 1 stc. on the following single ch. after the next 7 sc., 7 ch., and repeat from *. Crochet one round more on the side furnished with short loops as follows: Of the three loops above the next hollow of a scallop lay the first and second loop over the third loop, and on these three loops crochet 1 sc., six times alternately 4 ch., 1 sc. on the next loop, then 4 ch.; repeat from *. Join both parts of the edging as shown by the illustration, sewing the corresponding stitches together from the wrong side with overhand stitches. Finally, sew the finished edging on the outer edge of the collarette and sleeves.

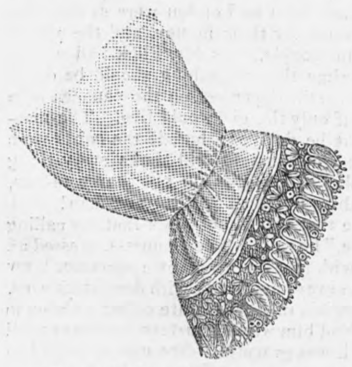

Fig. 2.—CRÊPE LISSE AND LACE SLEEVE.—[See Fig. 1.]

BOY'S WARDROBE.

FOR BOYS FROM 4 TO 9 YEARS OLD (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERNS).

WE have been repeatedly urged to publish cut paper patterns of a boy's wardrobe, corresponding to the girl's wardrobe which was so popular last summer, and which should comprise a complete set of boys' outer garments. The present patterns are in the latest and most approved fashion, and include the sack overcoat with deep cape, which is so generally worn by little boys, an English cutaway jacket, high vest, knee pantaloons, and knickerbocker trowsers. Six sizes are given, from 21 to 26 inches bust measure, for boys from 4 to 9 years old. To take the size pass a tape measure straight around the body, under the jacket, drawing it rather tight. The quantity of cloth estimated in the description is for the smallest size, or for a boy 4 years old. One-third of a yard is added for every year of age. In cutting cloth with a nap be particular to have it run toward the bottom of the garment.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

THIS wardrobe comprises five articles—fly-front sack overcoat with cape, jacket, vest, knee pantaloons, and knickerbockers.

SACK OVERCOAT WITH CAPE.—This pattern is in seven pieces—front, back, cape, sleeve, collar, and two pocket flaps. It is single-breasted, and closes with a fly front. Each front is faced. The left front is stitched two inches below the lower button-hole and two inches back up to the neck, and is tacked across between each button-hole. Lap the extra width at the left side of the back over the right, and tack the parts. There is a pocket in the left breast, and one in each front skirt. All are finished with flaps—the small one is for the breast pocket. Cut an opening between the perforations for the pockets. The cape is quite deep, and buttons on the coat under the collar. The perforations show where to cut the button-holes on the cape. The neck is finished with a collar, and turned down in the line of perforations. The coat sleeve is sewed plain in the armhole. The perforations show the size and form of the under part. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back part of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Make a small seam on the front at the neck where the ∨ is taken out. The edges of the garment are finished with braid. Be particular, in cutting the button-holes, not to cut through the outside cloth, but only the fly underneath. Cut the cape with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the cloth to avoid a seam.

Quantity of material, 54 inches wide, for a boy of four years, 1⅓ yards. Braid, 6 yards.

JACKET.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, back, sleeve, collar, and pocket flap. The perforations in the front show where to place the buttons and button-holes, to turn back the revers, to make a small seam, and to put in the pocket and sew on the pocket flap. Those in the sleeve show the size and form of the under part, and where to sew on the braid to form a cuff. Those in the collar show where it should be creased, and well shrunken in with the iron, so as to fit the neck. Close the seams; lap the extra width of the front over the back, and tack it firmly; lap the extra width at the left side of the back over the right, and tack the parts. Cut an opening on each side of the front between the perforations for the pocket, and sew on the pocket flap. Sew the hollowing edge of the collar to the neck, placing the seams in the back evenly together, and with the narrow end of the collar to the front. Place the outside seam of the sleeve at the notch in the back of the armhole, holding the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Bind the edges of the garment with braid. If the sleeve is too long or too short, add to or take off from the top as much as may be needed. An allowance for quarter-inch seams is made in the pattern.

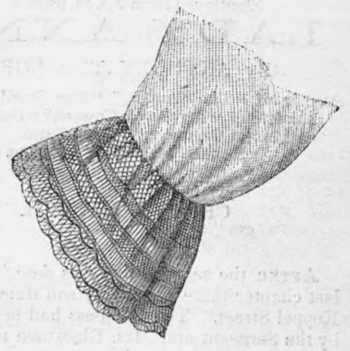

Fig. 5.—TULLE SLEEVE WITH CROCHET GIMP EDGING. [See Fig. 4.]

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for a boy of four years, 1½ yards. Braid, 2 yards.

VEST.—This pattern is in two pieces—front and back. The collar is cut on the front, and sewed on the back. The perforations show where to place the buttons and to cut for the pocket. The back is closed down to the notch. Bind the edges with braid. Close the front from the neck with buttons and button-holes. An allowance for quarter-inch seams is made in this pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for a boy of four years, half a yard. Braid, 1½ yards.

KNEE PANTALOONS.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, back, front and back waistband. The perforations in the front show where to place the buttons. Place the pocket between the notches in the outside edge of the front. Sew the short waistband plain to the top of the front. Sew the remaining waistband to the back in the same manner, allowing the end of this band to come to the edge of the facing cut on the front edge of the back. This facing is of sufficient width to allow the front waistband to lap over and button smoothly. Turn under the bottom at the notch on each side for a hem. Bind the edges with braid. Place three buttons near the bottom of the front at the outside seam according to the perforations, and as clearly shown by the illustration. The pantaloons can be buttoned to a shirt-waist. An

BOY'S WARDROBE—SACK OVERCOAT WITH CAPE.

[Cut Paper Patterns of Boy's Wardrobe, consisting of Sack Overcoat with Cape, Jacket, Vest, Knee Pantaloons, and Knickerbockers, for Boys from 4 to 9 Years old, in six Sizes, from 21 to 26 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

BOY'S WARDROBE—KNICKERBOCKERS.

[Cut Paper Patterns of Boy's Wardrobe, consisting of Sack Overcoat with Cape, Jacket, Vest, Knee Pantaloons, and Knickerbockers, for Boys from 4 to 9 Years old, in six Sizes, from 21 to 26 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

BOY'S WARDROBE—JACKET, VEST, AND KNEE PANTALOONS.—[PHOT. BY ROCKWOOD.]

[Cut Paper Patterns of Boy's Wardrobe, consisting of Sack Overcoat with Cape, Jacket, Vest, Knee Pantaloons, and Knickerbockers, for Boys from 4 to 9 Years old, in six Sizes, from 21 to 26 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

allowance for quarter-inch seams is made in this pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for a boy of four years, three-quarters of a yard.

KNICKERBOCKER TROWSERS.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, back, front and back of waistband. Turn under the bottom at the notch on each side for a hem. Place the pocket between the two upper notches in the outside edge of the front. Lap the outside edge of the front over the front edge of the back, leaving the seam open below the lower notch near the bottom part of the leg. Two side pleats, according to the notches, turning toward the front, are laid in the front at the top, and the short waistband is sewed on. Lay two similar pleats in the back, turning toward the back. Sew the remaining waistband to the back, allowing the end of this waistband to come to the edge of the facing cut on the front edge of the back. This facing is of sufficient width to allow the front waistband to lap over and button smoothly. Bind the edges with braid. Run an elastic cord through the hem, and fasten the trowsers below the knee with ribbons on the outside seam. These trowsers can be worn with jacket and vest, or shirt-waist. An allowance for quarter-inch seams is made in this pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for a boy of four years, 1 yard.

(Continued from No. 50, page 791.)

LADY ANNA.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

LET HER DIE.

AFTER the scene which was described in the last chapter there was a very sad time indeed in Keppel Street. The Countess had been advised by the Sergeant and Mrs. Bluestone to take her daughter immediately abroad, in the event of the interview with Daniel Thwaite being unsatisfactory. It was believed by all concerned, by the Bluestones and the Goffes, by Sir William Patterson, who had been told of the coming interview, and by the Countess herself, that this would not be the case. They had all thought that Lady Anna would come out from that meeting disengaged and free to marry whom she would—and they thought also that within a very few weeks of her emancipation she would accept her cousin's hand. The Solicitor-General had communicated with the Earl, who was still in town, and the Earl again believed that he might win the heiress. But should the girl prove obstinate, "take her away at once—very far away—to Rome, or some such place as that." Such had been Mrs. Bluestone's advice, and in those days Rome was much more distant than it is now. "And don't let any body know where you are going," added the Sergeant—"except Mr. Goffe." The Countess had assented; but when the moment came there were reasons against her sudden departure. Mr. Goffe told her that she must wait at any rate for another fortnight. The presence of herself and her daughter was necessary in London for the signing of deeds and completion of the now merely formal proofs of identity. And money was again scarce. A great deal of money had been spent lately, and unless money was borrowed without security, and at a great cost—to which Mr. Goffe was averse—the sum needed could hardly be provided at once. Mr. Goffe recommended that no day earlier than the 20th December should be fixed for their departure.

It was now the end of November, and it became a question how the intermediate time should be passed. The Countess was resolved that she would hold no pleasant intercourse at all with her daughter. She would not even tell the girl of her purpose of going abroad. From hour to hour she assured herself with still-increasing obduracy that nothing but severity could avail any thing. The girl must be cowed and frightened into absolute submission—even though at the expense of her health. Even though it was to be effected by the absolute crushing of her spirits, this must be done; though at the cost of her life, it must be done. This woman had lived for the last twenty years with but one object before her eyes—an object sometimes seeming to be near, more often distant, and not unfrequently altogether beyond her reach, but which had so grown upon her imagination as to become the heaven to which her very soul aspired. To be and to be known to be among the highly born, the so-called noble, the titled from old dates—to be of those who were purely aristocratic—had been all the world to her. As a child, the child of well-born but poor parents, she had received the idea. In following it out she had thrown all thoughts of love to the wind, and had married a reprobate earl. Then had come her punishment—or, as she had conceived it, her most unmerited misfortunes. For many years of her life her high courage and persistent demeanor had almost atoned for the vice of her youth. The love of rank was strong in her bosom as ever, but it was fostered for her child rather than for herself. Through long, tedious, friendless, poverty-stricken years she had endured all, still assuring herself that the day would come when the world should call the sweet plant that grew by her side by its proper name. The little children hooted after her daughter, calling her girl in derision The Lady Anna, when Lady Anna was more poorly clad and was blessed with less of the comforts of home than any of them. Years would roll by, and they should live to know that the Lady Anna, the sport of their infantine cruelty, was Lady Anna indeed. And as the girl became a woman the dream was becoming a reality. The rank, the title, the general acknowledgment, and the wealth would all be there. Then came the first great decisive triumph. Overtures of love and friendship were made from the other side. Would Lady Anna consent to become the Countess Lovel, might all animosities be buried, and every thing be made pleasant, prosperous, noble, and triumphant?

It is easy to fill with air a half-inflated bladder; it is already so buoyant with its own lightness that it yields itself with ease to receive the generous air. The imagination of the woman flew higher than ever it had flown when the proposition came home to her in all its bearings. Of course it had been in her mind that her daughter should marry well; but there had been natural fears. Her child had not been educated, had not lived, had not been surrounded in her young days, as are those girls from whom the curled darlings are wont to choose their wives. She would too probably be rough in manner, ungentle in speech, ungifted in accomplishments, as compared with those who from their very cradles are encompassed by the blessings of wealth and high social standing. But when she looked at her child's beauty she would hope. And then her child was soft, sweet-humored, winning in all her little ways, pretty even in the poor duds which were supplied to her mainly by the generosity of the tailor. And so she would hope, and sometimes despair, and then hope again. But she had never hoped for any thing so good as this. Such a marriage would not only put her daughter as high as a Lovel ought to be, but would make it known in a remarkable manner to all coming ages that she—she herself, she the despised and slandered one, who had been treated almost as woman had never been treated before—was in very truth the Countess Lovel by whose income the family had been restored to its old splendor.

And so the longing grew upon her. Then, almost for the first time, did she begin to feel that it was necessary for the purposes of her life that the girl whom she loved so thoroughly should be a creature in her hands, to be dealt with as she pleased. She would have had her daughter accede to the proposed marriage even before she had seen Lord Lovel, and was petulant when her daughter would not be as clay in the sculptor's hand. But still the girl's refusal had been but as the refusal of a girl. She should not have been as are other girls; she should have known better; she should have understood what the peculiarity of her position demanded. But it had not been so with her. She had not soared as she should have done above the love-laden dreams of common maidens. And so the visit to Yoxham was permitted. Then came the great blow—struck, as it were, by a third hand, and that the hand of an attorney. The Countess Lovel learned through Mr. Goffe—who had heard the tale from other lawyers—that her daughter, Lady Anna Lovel, had, with her own mouth, told her noble lover that she was betrothed to a tailor! She felt at the moment that she could have died—cursing the child for this black ingratitude.

But there might still be hope. The trial was going on, or the work which was progressing toward the trial, and she was surrounded by those who could advise her. Doubtless what had happened was a great misfortune. But there was room for hope—room for most assured hope. The Earl was not disposed to abandon the match, though he had, of course, been greatly annoyed—nay, disgusted and degraded—by the girl's communication. But he had consented to see the matter in the proper light. The young tailor had got an influence over the girl when she was a child, was doubtless in pursuit of money, and must be paid. The folly of a child might be forgiven, and the Earl would persevere. No one would know what had occurred, and the thing would be forgotten as a freak of childhood. The Countess had succumbed to the policy of all this, but she was not deceived by the benevolent falsehood. Lady Anna had been over twenty when she had been receiving lover's vows from this man, reeking from his tailor's board. And her girl, her daughter, had deceived her. That the girl had deceived her, saying there was no other lover, was much; but it was much more and worse and more damnable that there had been thorough deception as to the girl's own appreciation of her rank. The sympathy tendered through so many years must have been always pretended sympathy. With these feelings hot within her bosom, she could not bring herself to speak one kindly word to Lady Anna after the return from Yoxham. The girl was asked to abandon her odious lover with stern severity. It was demanded of her that she should do so with cruel threats. She would never quite yield, though she had then no strength of purpose sufficient to enable her to declare that she would not yield. We know how she was banished to Bedford Square, and transferred from the ruthless persistency of her mother to the less stern but not less fixed manœuvres of Mrs. Bluestone. At that moment of her existence she was herself in doubt. In Wyndham Street and at Yoxham she had almost more than doubted. The softness of the new Elysium had well-nigh unnerved her. When that young man had caught her from stone to stone as she passed over the ford at Bolton she was almost ready to give herself to him. But then had come upon her the sense of sickness, that fade, overdone flavor of sugared sweetness, which arises when sweet things become too luscious to the eater. She had struggled to be honest and strong, and had just not fallen into the pot of treacle.

But, notwithstanding all this, they who saw her and knew the story were still sure that the lord must at last win the day. There was not one who believed that such a girl could be true to such a troth as she had made. Even the Solicitor-General when he told the tale which the amorous steward had remembered to his own encouragement did not think but what the girl and the girl's fortune would fall into the hands of his client. Human nature demanded that it should be so. That it should be as he wished it was so absolutely consonant with all nature, as he had known it, that he had preferred trusting to this result, in his client's behalf, to leaving the case in a jury's hands. At this moment he was sure he was right in his judgment—and indeed he was right—for no jury could have done any thing for his client.

It went on till at last the wise men decided that the girl only wanted to be relieved by her old lover that she might take a new lover with his permission. The girl was, no doubt, peculiar; but as far as the wise ones could learn from her manner—for with words she would say nothing—that was her state of mind. So the interview was planned, to the infinite disgust of the Countess, who, however, believed that it might avail; and we know what was the result. Lady Anna, who long had doubted—who had at last almost begun to doubt whether Daniel Thwaite was true to her—had renewed her pledges, strengthened her former promises, and was now more firmly betrothed than ever to him whom the Countess hated as a very fiend upon earth. But there certainly should be no marriage! though she pistoled the man at the altar, there should be no marriage.

And then there came upon her the infinite disgust arising from the necessity of having to tell her sorrows to others, who could not sympathize with her, though their wishes were as hers. It was hard upon her that no step could be taken by her in reference to her daughter without the knowledge of Mr. Goffe and Sergeant Bluestone, and the consequent knowledge of Mr. Flick and the Solicitor-General. It was necessary, too, that Lord Lovel should know all. His conduct in many things must depend on the reception which might probably be accorded to a renewal of his suit. Of course he must be told. He had already been told that the tailor was to be admitted to his love, in order that she might be absolved by the tailor from her first vow. It had not been pleasant—but he had acceded. Mr. Flick had taken upon himself to say that he was sure that every thing would be made pleasant. The Earl had frowned, and had been very short with Mr. Flick. These confidences with lawyers about his love-suit, and his love's tone with her low-born lover, had not been pleasant to Lord Lovel. But he had endured it, and now he must be told of the result. Oh heavens! what a hell of misery was this girl making for her high-born relatives! But the story of the tailor's visit to Keppel Street did not reach the unhappy ones at Yoxham till months had passed away.

Mr. Goffe was very injudicious in postponing the departure of the two ladies, as the Solicitor-General told Mr. Flick afterward very plainly, when he heard of what had been done. "Money! she might have had any money. I would have advanced it." "You would have advanced it!" "Oh, certainly," said Mr. Flick, not, however, at all relishing the idea of advancing money to his client's adversary. "I never heard of such folly," continued Sir William. "That comes of trusting people who should not be trusted." But it was too late then. Lady Anna was lying ill in bed, in fever, and three doctors doubted whether she would ever get up again. "Would it not be better that she should die?" said her mother to herself, standing over her and looking at her. It would—so thought the mother then—be better that she should die than get up to become the wife of Daniel Thwaite. But how much better that she should live and become the Countess Lovel! She still loved her child as only a mother can love her only child—as only a mother can love who has no hope of joy in the world but what is founded on her child. But the other passion had become so strong in her bosom that it almost conquered her mother's yearnings. Was she to fight for long years that she might be beaten at last when the prize was so near her—when the cup was almost at her lips? Were the girl now to be taken to her grave, there would be an end at any rate of the fear which now most heavily oppressed her. But the three doctors were called in, one after another; and Lady Anna was tended as though her life was as precious as that of any other daughter.

These new tidings caused new perturbation among the lawyers. "They say that Clarke and Holland have given her over," said Mr. Flick to Sir William.

"I am sorry to hear it," said Mr. Solicitor; "but girls do live sometimes in spite of the doctors."

"Yes, very true, Sir William; very true. But if it should go in that way, it might not perhaps be amiss for our client."

"God forbid that he should prosper by his cousin's death, Mr. Flick. But the Countess would be the heir."

"The Countess is devoted to the Earl. We ought to do something, Sir William. I don't think that we could claim above eight or ten thousand pounds at most as real property. He put his money every where, did that old man. There are shares in iron mines in the Alleghanies worth ever so much."

"They are no good to us," said the Solicitor-General, alluding to his client's interests.

"Not worth a half-penny to us, though they are paying twenty per cent. on the paid-up capital. He seems to have determined that the real heir should get nothing, even if there were no will. A wicked old man!"

"Very wicked, Mr. Flick."

"A horrible old man! But we really ought to do something, Mr. Solicitor. If the girl won't marry him there should be some compromise, after all that we have done."

"How can the girl marry any one, Mr. Flick, if she's going to die?"

A few days after this Sir William called in Keppel Street and saw the Countess, not with any idea of promoting a compromise—for the doing which this would not have been the time, nor would he have been the fitting medium—but in order that he might ask after Lady Anna's health. The whole matter was, indeed, now going very much against the Earl. Money had been allowed to the Countess and her daughter; and in truth all the money was now their own, to do with it as they listed, though there might be some delay before each was put into absolute possession of her own proportion; but no money had been allowed, or could be allowed, to the Earl; and that the fact was so was now becoming known to all men. Hitherto credit had at any rate been easy with the young lord. When the old Earl died, and when the will was set aside, it was thought that he would be the heir. When the lawsuit first came up it was believed every where that some generous compromise would be the worst that could befall him. After that the marriage had been almost a certainty, and then it was known that he had something of his own, so that tradesmen need not fear that their bills would not be paid. It can hardly be said that he had been extravagant; but a lord must live, and an earl can hardly live and maintain a house in the country on a thousand a year, even though he has an uncle to keep his hunters for him. Some prudent men in London were already beginning to ask for their money, and the young Earl was in trouble. As Mr. Flick had said, it was quite time that something should be done. Sir William still depended on the panacea of a marriage, if only the girl would live. The marriage might be delayed; but, if the cards were played prudently, might still make every thing comfortable. Such girls do not marry tailors, and will always prefer lords to tradesmen!

"I hope that you do not think that my calling is intrusive," he said. The Countess, dressed all in black, with that funereal frown upon her brow which she always now wore, with deep-sunk eyes, and care legible in every feature of her handsome face, received him with a courtesy that was as full of woe as it was graceful. She was very glad to make his acquaintance. There was no intrusion. He would forgive her, she thought, if he perceived that circumstances had almost overwhelmed her with sorrow. "I have come to ask after your daughter," said he.

"She has been very ill, Sir William."

"Is she better now?"

"I hardly know; I can not say. They seemed to think this morning that the fever was less violent."

"Then she will recover, Lady Lovel."

"They do not say so. But indeed I did not ask them. It is all in God's hands. I sometimes think that it would be better that she should die, and there be an end of it."

This was the first time that these two had been in each other's company, and the lawyer could not altogether repress the feeling of horror with which he heard the mother speak in such a way of her only child. "Oh, Lady Lovel, do not say that!"

"But I do say it. Why should I not say it to you, who know all? Of what good will her life be to herself, or to any one else, if she pollute herself and her family by this marriage? It would be better that she should be dead—much better that she should be dead. She is all that I have, Sir William. It is for her sake that I have been struggling from the first moment in which I knew that I was to be a mother. The whole care of my life has been to prove her to be her father's daughter in the eyes of the law. I doubt whether you can know what it is to pursue one object, and only one, through your whole life, with never-ending solicitude, and to do it all on behalf of another. If you did, you would understand my feelings now. It would be better for her that she should die than become the wife of such a one as Daniel Thwaite."

"Lady Lovel, not only as a mother, but as a Christian, you should get the better of that feeling."

"Of course I should. No doubt every clergyman in England would tell me the same thing. It is easy to say all that, Sir. Wait till you are tried. Wait till all your ambition is to be betrayed, every hope rolled in the dust, till all the honors you have won are to be soiled and degraded, and made a mark for general scorn and public pity, and then tell me how you love the child by whom such evils are brought upon you."

"I trust that I may never be so tried, Lady Lovel."

"I hope not; but think of all that before you preach to me. But I do love her; and it is because I love her that I would fain see her removed from the reproaches which her own madness will bring upon her. Let her die—if it be God's will. I can follow her without one wish for a prolonged life. Then will a noble family be again established, and her sorrowful tale will be told among the Lovels with a tear and without a curse."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

LADY ANNA'S BEDSIDE.

ALL December went by, and the neighbors in the houses round spent each his merry Christmas; and the snow and frost of January passed over them, and February had come and nearly gone, before the doctors dared to say that Lady Anna Lovel's life was not still in danger. During this long period the world had known all about her illness, as it did know, or pretend to know, the whole history of her life. The world had been informed that she was dying, and had, upon the whole, been really very sorry for her.

Hosted by Google

She had interested the world, and the world had heard much of her youth and beauty—of the romance, too, of her story, of her fidelity to the tailor, and of her persecutions. During these months of her illness the world was disposed to think that the tailor was a fine fellow, and that he ought to be taken by the hand. He had money now, and it was thought that it would be a good thing to bring him into some club. There was a very strong feeling at the Beaufort that if he were properly proposed and seconded he would be elected—not because he was going to marry an heiress, but because he was losing the heiress whom he was to have married. If the girl died, then Lord Lovel himself might bring him forward at the Beaufort. Of all this, Daniel himself knew nothing; but he heard, as all the world heard, that Lady Anna was on her death-bed.

When the news first reached him—after a fashion that seemed to him to be hardly worthy of credit—he called at the house in Keppel Street and asked the question. Yes, Lady Anna was very ill. But, as it happened, Sarah, the lady's-maid, opened the door, and Sarah remembered the tailor. She had seen him when he was admitted to her young mistress, and knew enough of the story to be aware that he should be snubbed. Her first answer was given before she had bethought herself; then she snubbed him, and told no one but the Countess of his visit. After that Daniel went to one of the doctors, and waited at his door with patience till he could be seen. The unhappy man told his story plainly. He was Daniel Thwaite, late a tailor, the man from Keswick, to whom Lady Anna Lovel was engaged. In charity and loving-kindness, would the doctor tell him of the state of his beloved one? The doctor took him by the hand and asked him in, and did tell him. His beloved one was then on the very point of death. Whereupon Daniel wrote to the Countess in humble strains, himself taking the letter, and waiting without in the street for any answer that might be vouchsafed. If it was, as he was told, that his beloved was dying, might he be allowed to stand once at her bedside and kiss her hand? In about an hour an answer was brought to him at the area gate. It consisted of his own letter, opened, and returned to him without a word. He went away, too sad to curse, but he declared to himself that such cruelty in a woman's bosom could exist only in the bosom of a countess.

But as others heard early in February that Lady Anna was likely to recover, so did Daniel Thwaite. Indeed, his authority was better than that which reached the clubs, for the doctor still stood his friend. Could the doctor take a message from him to Lady Anna—but one word? No, the doctor could take no message. That he would not do. But he did not object to give to the lover a bulletin of the health of his sweetheart. In this way Daniel knew sooner than most others when the change took place in the condition of his beloved one.

Lady Anna would be of age in May, and the plan of her betrothed was as follows: He would do nothing till that time, and then he would call upon her to allow their banns to be published in Bloomsbury Church after the manner of the Church of England. He himself had taken lodgings in Great Russell Street, thinking that his object might be aided by living in the same parish. If, as was probable, he would not be allowed to approach Lady Anna either in person or by letter, then he would have recourse to the law, and would allege that the young lady was unduly kept a prisoner in custody. He was told that such complaint would be as idle wind coming from him—that no allegation of that kind could obtain any redress unless it came from the young lady herself; but he flattered himself that he could so make it that the young lady would at any rate obtain thereby the privilege of speaking for herself. Let some one ask her what were her wishes, and he would be prepared to abide by her expression of them.

In the mean time Lord Lovel also had been anxious; but his anxiety had been met in a very different fashion. For many days the Countess saw him daily, so that there grew up between them a close intimacy. When it was believed that the girl would die—believed with that sad assurance which made those who were concerned speak of her death almost as a certainty—the Countess, sitting alone with the young Earl, had told him that all would be his if the girl left them. He had muttered something as to there being no reason for that. "Who else should have it?" said the Countess. "Where should it go? Your people, Lovel, have not understood me. It is for the family that I have been fighting, fighting, fighting, and never ceasing. Though you have been my adversary, it has been all for the Lovels. If she goes, it shall be yours at once. There is no one knows how little I care for wealth myself." Then the girl had become better, and the Countess again began her plots, and her plans, and her strategy. She would take the girl abroad in May—in April if it might be possible. They would go, not to Rome then, but to the south of France, and, as the weather became too warm for them, on to Switzerland and the Tyrol. Would he, Lord Lovel, follow them? Would he follow them and be constant in his suit, even though the frantic girl should still talk of her tailor lover? If he would do so, as far as money was concerned, all should be in common with them. For what was the money wanted but that the Lovels might be great and noble and splendid? He said that he would do so. He also loved the girl—thought, at least during the tenderness created by her illness, that he loved her with all his heart. He sat hour after hour with the Countess in Keppel Street—sometimes seeing the girl as she lay unconscious, or feigning that she was so, till at last he was daily at her bedside. "You had better not talk to him, Anna," her mother would say, "but of course he is anxious to see you." Then the Earl would kiss her hand, and in her mother's presence she had not the courage—perhaps she had not the strength—to withdraw it. In these days the Countess was not cruelly stern, as she had been. Besides, nursing hardly admits of such cruelty of manner. But she never spoke to her child with little tender endearing words, never embraced her, but was to her a careful nurse rather than a loving mother.

Then by degrees the girl got better, and was able to talk. "Mamma," she said one day, "won't you sit by me?"

"No, my dear; you should not be encouraged to talk."

"Sit by me, and let me hold your hand." For a moment the Countess gave way, and sat by her daughter, allowing her hand to remain pressed beneath the bedclothes; but she rose abruptly, remembering her grievance—remembering that it would be better that her child should die, should die broken-hearted by unrelenting cruelty, than be encouraged to think it possible that she should do as she desired. So she rose abruptly and left the bedside without a word.

"Mamma," said Lady Anna, "will Lovel be here to-day?"

"I suppose he will be here."

"Will you let me speak to him for a minute?"

"Surely you may speak to him."

"I am strong now, mamma, and I think that I shall be well again some day. I have so often wished that I might die!"

"You had better not talk about it, my dear."

"But I should like to speak to him, mamma, without you."

"What to say, Anna?"

"I hardly know; but I should like to speak to him. I have something to say about money."

"Can not I say it?"

"No, mamma. I must say it myself—if you will let me." The Countess looked at her girl with suspicion, but she gave the permission demanded. Of course it would be right that this lover should see his lover. The Countess was almost minded to require from Lady Anna an assurance that no allusion should be made to Daniel Thwaite; but the man's name had not been mentioned between them since the beginning of the illness, and she was loath to mention it now. Nor would it have been possible to prevent for long such an interview as that now proposed.

"He shall come in if he pleases," said the Countess; "but I hope you will remember who you are and to whom you are speaking."

"I will remember both, mamma," said Lady Anna. The Countess looked down on her daughter's face, and could not help thinking that her child was different from what she had been. There had been almost defiance in the words spoken, though they had been spoken with the voice of an invalid.

At three o'clock that afternoon, according to his custom, Lord Lovel came, and was at once told that he was to be spoken to by his cousin. "She says it is about money," said the Countess.

"About money?"

"Yes—and if she confines herself to that, do as she bids you. If she is ever to be your wife it will be all right; and if not, then it will be better in your hands than in hers. In three months' time she can do as she pleases with it all." He was then taken into Lady Anna's room. "Here is your cousin," said the Countess. "You must not talk long, or I shall interrupt you. If you wish to speak to him about the property—as the head of your family—that will be very right; but confine yourself to that for the present." Then the Countess left them, and closed the door.

"It is not only about money, Lord Lovel."

"You might call me Frederic now," said he, tenderly.

"No, not now. If I am ever well again, and we are then friends, I will do so. They tell me that there is ever so much money—hundreds of thousands of pounds. I forget how much."

"Do not trouble yourself about that."

"But I do trouble myself very much about it, and I know that it ought to be yours. There is one thing I want to tell you, which you must believe. If I am ever any man's wife, I shall be the wife of Daniel Thwaite." That dark frown came upon his face which she had seen once before. "Pray believe that it is so," she continued. "Mamma does not believe it—will not believe it; but it is so. I love him with all my heart. I think of him every minute. It is very, very cruel that I may not hear from him or send one word to tell him how I am. There! My hand is on the Bible, and I swear to you that if I am ever the wife of any man, I will be his wife."

He looked down at her and saw that she was wan and thin and weak, and he did not dare to preach to her the old family sermon as to his rank and station. "But, Anna, why do you tell me this now?" he said.

"That you may believe it, and not trouble yourself with me any more. You must believe it when I tell you so in this manner. I may perhaps never live to rise from my bed. If I get well, I shall send to him, or go. I will not be hindered. He is true to me, and I will be true to him. You may tell mamma if you think proper. She would not believe me, but perhaps she may believe you. But, Lord Lovel, it is not fit that he should have all this money. He does not want it, and he would not take it. Till I am married I may do what I please with it—and it shall be yours."

"That can not be."

"Yes, it can. I know that I can make it yours if I please. They tell me that—that you are not rich, as Lord Lovel should be, because all this has been taken from you. That was the reason why you came to me."

"By Heaven, Anna, I love you most truly."

"It could not have been so when you had not seen me. Will you take a message from me to Daniel Thwaite?"

He thought a while before he answered it. "No, I can not do that."

"Then I must find another messenger. Mr. Goffe will do it, perhaps. He shall tell me how much he wants to keep, and the rest shall be yours. That is all. If you tell mamma, ask her not to be hard to me." He stood over her and took her hand, but knew not how to speak a word to her. He attempted to kiss her hand; but she raised herself on her elbow, and shook her head and drew it from him. "It belongs to Daniel Thwaite," she said. Then he left her and did not speak another word.

"What has she said?" asked the Countess, with an attempt at smiling.

"I do not know that I should tell you."

"Surely, Lovel, you are bound to tell me."

"She has offered me all her property—or most of it."

"She is right," said the Countess.

"But she has sworn to me, on the Bible, that she will never be my wife."

"Tush!—it means nothing."

"Ah, yes, it means much; it means all. She never loved me—not for an instant. That other man has been before me, and she is too firm to be moved."

"Did she say so?"

He was silent for a moment, and then replied, "Yes, she did say so."

"Then let her die!" said the Countess.

"Lady Lovel!"

"Let her die. It will be better. O God! that I should be brought to this! And what will you do, my lord? Do you mean to say that you will abandon her?"

"I can not ask her to be my wife again."

"What! because she has said this in her sickness—when she is half delirious—while she is dreaming of the words that man spoke to her? Have you no more strength than that? Are you so poor a creature?"

"I think I have been a poor creature to ask her a second time at all."

"No, not so. Your duty and mine are the same—as should be hers. We must forget ourselves while we save the family. Do not I bear all? Have not I borne every thing—contumely, solitude, ill words, poverty, and now this girl's unkindness? But even yet I will not give it up. Take the property, as it is offered."

"I could not touch it."

"If not for you, then for your children. Take it all, so that we may be the stronger. But do not abandon us now, if you are a man."

He would not stay to hear her further exhortations, but hurried away from the house, full of doubt and unhappiness.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

WHILE yet fresh in the public mind are the harrowing details of the wreck of the Atlantic on the rock-bound coast of Nova Scotia, from mid-ocean there comes a fearful tale. In the dead of night two vessels, rushing on their swift course in fancied safety, suddenly crash against each other. A great flood of water pours through the broken side of the unfortunate Ville du Havre. She is freighted with three hundred and thirteen precious souls, and the majority of them are sleeping. How fearful the sudden waking to strange danger and death! How appalling the confusion, the wild shrieks of terror, and the fierce, instinctive struggles for life! Who can imagine the horrors of the scene? But the time is short. In twelve minutes from the time of collision the noble steamer sinks, carrying down with her—as it is now believed—two hundred and twenty-six persons. Eighty-seven are reported saved.

This sad disaster occurred about two o'clock in the morning of November 23. The Ville du Havre was built a few years ago, and known as the Napoleon III. Last winter she was reconstructed, and came to this port in April as the Ville du Havre. She was one of the largest steamers afloat, magnificently fitted up, and all her interior arrangements were of the most approved kind. The captain, who was saved from the wreck, and the officers of the vessel are believed to have been efficient and faithful. The Loch Earn, which unknowingly dealt the fatal blow, is a powerful ship, built at Glasgow, and belonging to the Glasgow Ship Company. She was employed in carrying cargoes between New York and London. Apparently her officers and crew did all in their power to aid the unfortunates who were wrecked, rescuing many in boats, and searching for survivors until further efforts seemed hopeless. It soon became evident that the Loch Earn was seriously damaged by the collision, and she hoisted signals of distress, to which the American ship Trimountain responded several hours after the disaster. It was thought prudent to transfer the survivors to the Trimountain, which carried them to Cardiff, Wales, where they were landed and most kindly cared for by the citizens. Although it scarcely appears possible that such an appalling calamity could occur unless there was lack of vigilance somewhere, yet, while all facts are so imperfectly known, blame is justly withheld. Seldom has any catastrophe stricken with sudden death so many who have been widely known beyond the immediate circle of their own families. The passengers were from the cultivated and wealthy classes, and in some cases whole families, or all excepting one or two, were swept away. Mourning is carried into many desolate mansions, and the great public sympathizes in the loss of those who have filled conspicuous places in society. On both sides of the Atlantic the news of this great disaster has caused the deepest sorrow—not only in the hearts of those who have been personally bereaved, but among the thousands who keenly sympathize with them.

Among the passengers of the Ville du Havre was Mrs. H. G. Spafford, wife of a prominent lawyer of Chicago, with her four children and adopted son. On the night of the great Chicago fire Mrs. Spafford rescued the lives of her children with difficulty, and they spent the bleak night in the open air. They never recovered from the effects of the exposure; and hoping to restore the health of her family, Mrs. Spafford sought change and recreation by traveling in Europe. The following cable dispatch came to Mr. Spafford:

"HÔTEL DE VILLE, HAVRE, December 1, 1873.—Saved alone. Mrs. Goodwin and her children and Willie Culver lost. What shall I do?"

Mrs. Goodwin was also from Chicago, and her two children were nine and eleven years of age. It is a singular circumstance that Mrs. Goodwin first engaged passage in the Abyssinia, of the Cunard line, but was induced to change her route. Young Culver was thirteen years old, and on his way to attend school in Germany. All these were traveling in one party, and their loss has cast a gloom over Chicago. Mr. Henry Sigourney, of Boston, his wife and three children, with the nurse, all perished. One son is left, a member of the Freshman class of Harvard. Miss Madeline Mixter, a young lady of seventeen, and her young sister Helen, were saved, while their parents and grandfather, Mr. Nathaniel Curtis, went down with the ship. They were also from Boston, although recently Mr. Mixter and family had resided abroad, and they were returning to their foreign home.

Captain Charles Hunter, of Newport, Rhode Island, his wife, three daughters, and maid-servant, were on the Ville du Havre. Two daughters were rescued from the waves, the others all perished. It is said that Mr. Hunter undertook the voyage with many misgivings, being impressed with the feeling that some misfortune was impending.

"CARDIFF, December 1, 1873.—Julia went down with the steamer. My health unimpaired. Sufficient funds to go to Paris. CHARLEY."

Such was the telegram received from an invalid son by Mr. Waite, proprietor of the Brevoort House, in this city. The sister, who had gone with her brother, intending to spend the winter in the south of France, was buried in mid-ocean. Two young lady artists, Miss Lizzie W. Putnam and Miss Mary H. Church, of Boston, occupied the same state-room, and perished together. They had studied art together at the Cooper Institute, and their object in crossing the Atlantic was to visit the art galleries of Europe. Miss Caroline Turcas was a beautiful young lady of seventeen. She was on her way to Paris to be married. Her brief history is as follows: Her parents were of French descent, and resided, before the present difficulties, in the island of Cuba, in the city of Santiago de Cuba, where they owned large coffee plantations. At the breaking out of the revolution in Cuba they came to this city. Within the last two years they both died, and about a year ago a brother of the young lady in question died at Santiago de Cuba, shortly after his arrival at that port, where he went to settle up some family affairs. Mr. and Mrs. William Ross Swift, of New Bedford, Massachusetts, were en route for Germany, where Mrs. Swift was intending to complete her musical education. They were both saved, although Mr. Swift's rescue was remarkable, as he is crippled by lameness. But their little daughter Mary sank to the bottom of the ocean. Mrs. A. G. Kennett, of Buffalo, with two children and servant, was among the lost. She was on her way to Marseilles to join her husband, the lieutenant-commander and navigating officer of the sloop of war Alaska, attached to the Mediterranean squadron off Cartagena.

Such are some of the incidents—and there are many of similar interest—connected with the lost passengers of the Ville du Havre.

The total number of visitors to the Central Park during 1872 was nearly 10,900,000, and the number this year has already exceeded those figures. One day last January there were 75,000 visitors, of whom at least 40,000 resorted to the lakes and ponds. The lakes and ponds of the Park include many acres, from which the snow is carefully cleared after each snow-storm, so that the ice may be in good condition for skating. The expense of this work last year was no less than $22,000.

The Mont Cenis Tunnel is about seven miles in length; the Hoosac will be about four and three-quarters. In exact figures it is 25,031 feet long, with a roadway twenty-four feet wide, and corresponding height. The Hoosac Mountains, which, running through the western part of Massachusetts, have formed such a troublesome barrier to direct and easy communication between the Western States and the metropolis of New England, were penetrated on the afternoon of Thanksgiving-day, after long years of persevering labor. Nearly half a century ago the Hoosac Tunnel was proposed; and after numerous difficulties the railroad, of which this tunnel forms a part, was chartered in 1848, and in 1852 work was commenced on the tunnel itself. It was under various and skillful supervision until 1868. A contract for the completion of the work was given in 1869 to the Messrs. Shanley, of Canada, the understanding being that the tunnel should be opened by March 1, 1874, a margin of six months being given in case of special difficulties in mining. The work has been pushed forward with great vigor, and can not but be regarded as a great triumph of engineering skill.

Terrible evils are impending over large portions of Northern India. Bengal is threatened with absolute want of food. Rice crops have failed, there are no stores of grain, and ten millions of people are almost helpless. Fortunately the crops have been good in some sections of India, and the English government of Bengal is taking measures to supply food to the famine-stricken regions. Rice is all the daily food that a Hindoo absolutely requires, and this is what should be furnished.

The managers of the Boston Public Library have done a wise thing in making special arrangements to secure the building as far as possible against fire.

Several well-known gentlemen, representing the various public and private charitable societies of this city, recently met at Cooper Institute to devise co-operative measures by which the worthy poor might be relieved. A committee was appointed to ascertain the present amount of actual want, and to devise and present to a subsequent meeting a well devised and carefully digested plan, which, while preventing fraud upon public benevolence, and avoiding invitation to become paupers, will insure a wise and adequate protection for the suffering poor.

Hosted by Google

"AFTER MEETING."—DRAWN BY E. A. ABBEY.—[SEE PAGE 825.]

Hosted by Google

VIEWS IN NEW YORK CITY.

THE accompanying graphic illustrations give good representative views of two of the four longitudinal avenues which form the favorite residence part of New York city. These are Fifth, Madison, Park or Fourth, and Lexington avenues, which run parallel to each other in the order named, and vary in width from seventy-five to one hundred and forty feet. From Lexington Avenue on the east to Sixth Avenue on the west is at present the fashionable quarter of New York. But the bounds of this quarter are as shifting as quicksands, and the rapidly advancing business will probably drive it back ere long to the region about the Central Park, where it will establish itself permanently as around Hyde Park in London.

Our first illustration shows in the foreground the beautiful Jewish synagogue, the Temple Emanuel, on the east side of Fifth Avenue, on the corner of Forty-third Street. This Oriental structure relieves the eye from the monotony of the brown-stone buildings about it, and is in itself a suggestion of the land of Judæa. Looking southward, we see on the right, at Forty-second Street, the lower Croton Reservoir, and beyond it the Brick Church, familiarly known as Dr. Spring's, on the corner of Thirty-seventh Street, and the Collegiate Reformed Church, on the corner of Twenty-ninth Street, in the distance.

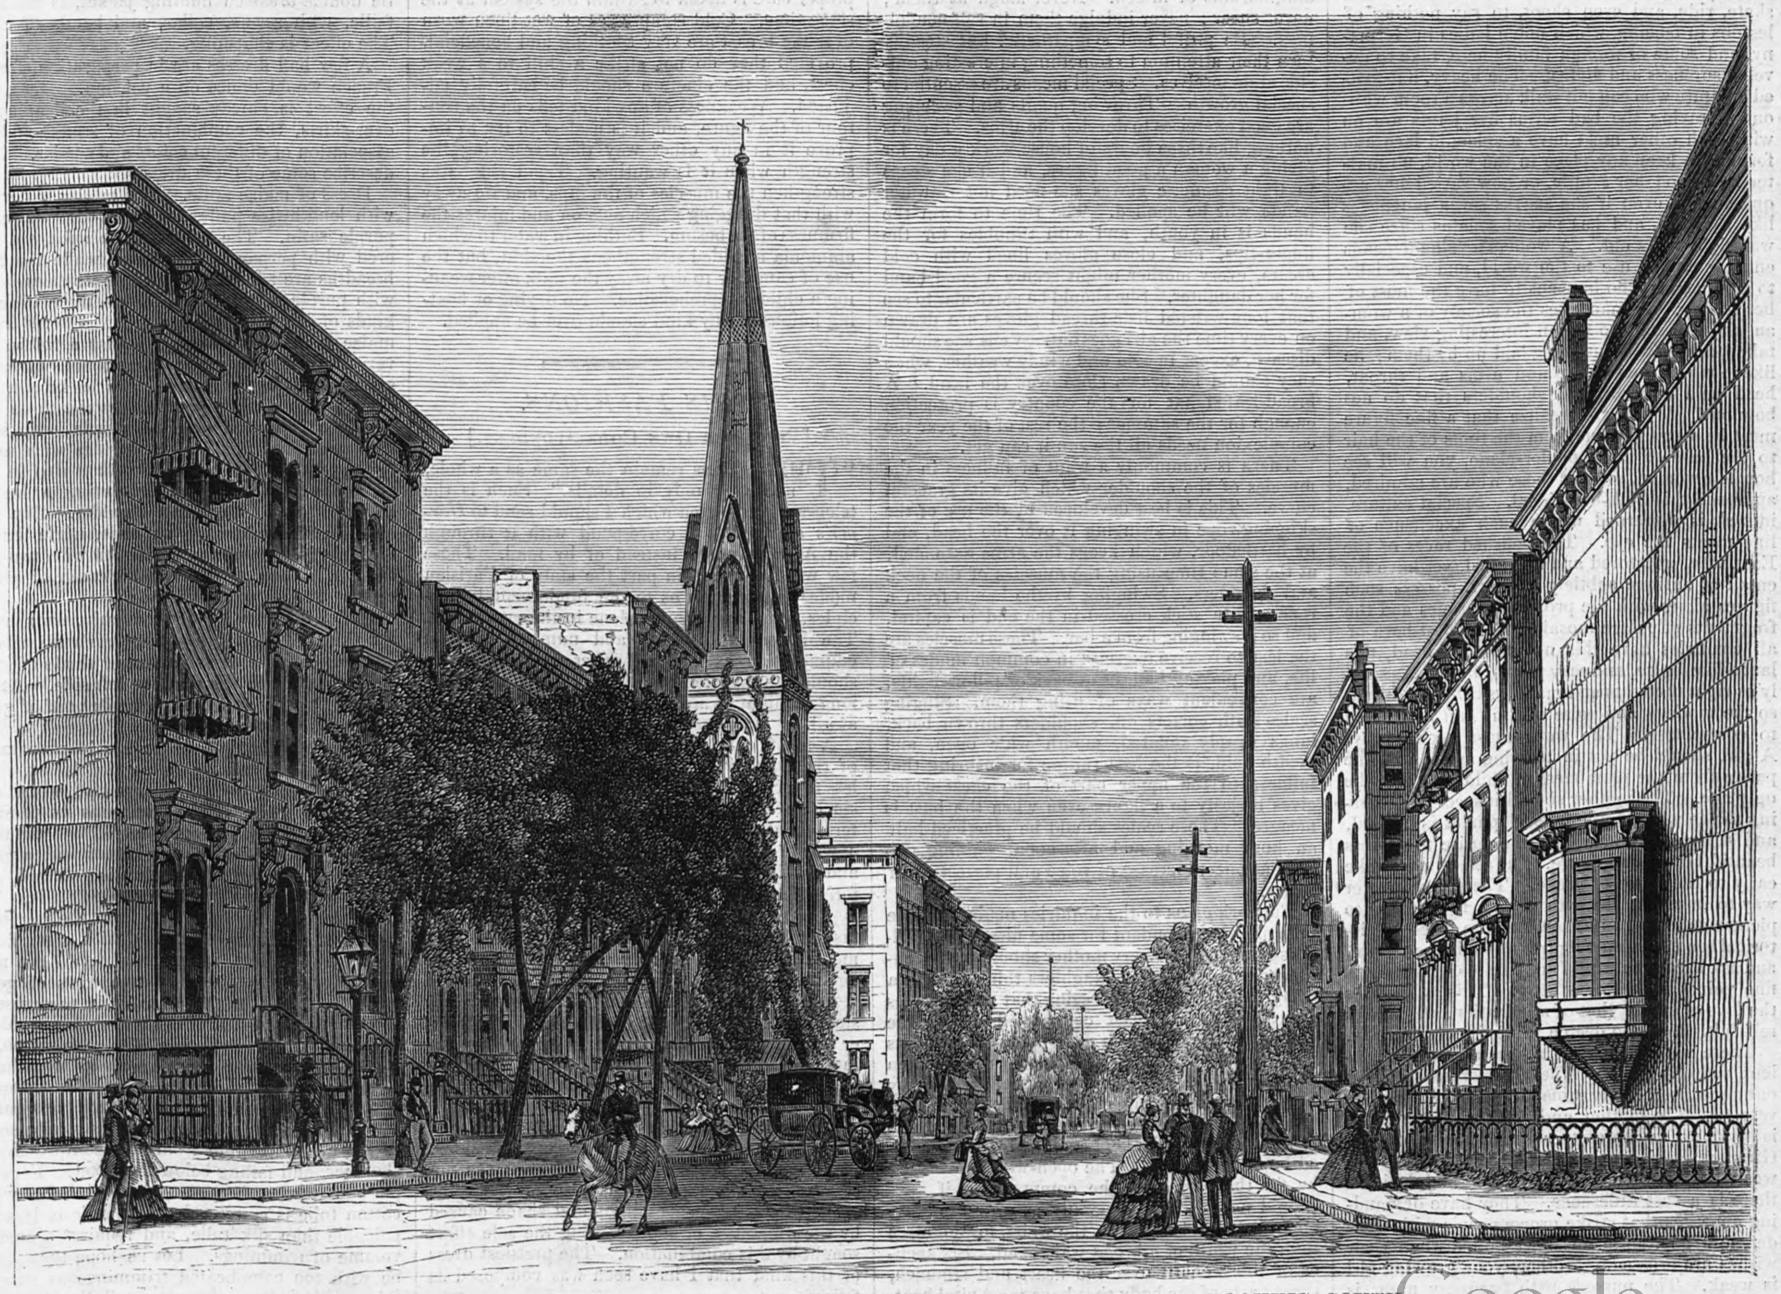
In the second illustration we see in the foreground the Protestant Episcopal Church of St. John the Baptist, on the east side of Lexington Avenue, at the intersection of Thirty-sixth Street, on the summit of Murray Hill. Beyond is the vista of the pleasant and well-shaded avenue, with its blocks of brown-stone houses, with picturesque bay-windows projecting here and there into the street.

FIFTH AVENUE AND FORTY-THIRD STREET, NEW YORK CITY, LOOKING SOUTH.

"AFTER MEETING."

See illustration on p. 824.

THIS picture tells its own story to all who have ever witnessed the sociable quarter of an hour that follows the dismissal of a village congregation. It is the festivity of the week to many of the church-goers, their single opportunity to come in contact with the world about them and to meet their neighbors. Lovers exchange furtive greetings, gossips discuss the village news, farmers talk over the crops and shrewdly hint at possible bargains, and children gaze in wonder at their elders in their Sunday clothes, while the horses wait under the trees until the crowd is ready to disperse. This social gathering would be sorely missed in the country. It is the one occasion when the villagers are almost sure to meet en masse, for every body goes to church in the country, and to be absent from one's pew without cause is to incur ostracism as a pagan. Moreover, they usually know each other's affairs well enough to see through any flimsy excuses.



LEXINGTON AVENUE AND THIRTY-SIXTH STREET, NEW YORK CITY, LOOKING SOUTH.

Hosted by Google

ALL-SAINTS' DAY,

AT NEW COLLEGE CHAPEL, OXFORD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

I SHALL find them again, I shall find them again,
Though I can not tell when or where;
My earthly own gone to worlds unknown,
But never beyond Thy care.

I shall find them again, I shall find them again,
By the soul that within me dwells,
And leaps unto Thee with rapture free,
As the jubilant autumn swells:

"I heard a voice saying—" What it says
I hear. So perchance do they,
As I stand between my living, I ween,
And my dead, upon All-Saints' Day.

And I see all clear: new heavens, new earth,
New bodies redeemed from pain;
New souls—ah! not so: with the soul that I know
Let me find, let me find them again!

Let me walk with them under any sky,
Beside any land or sea,
In what shape or make Thou will'st us to take,
If like unto, near to, Thee.

Let me wander wherever Thou bid'st me go,
Rest, labor, or even remain
Lulled in long still sleep in the earth or the deep,
If I wake to find them again.

Only at times does the awful mist
Lift off, and we seem to see
For a moment's space the far dwelling-place
Of these our beloved, and Thee.

Only at times through our souls' shut doors
Come visits divine as brief,
And we cease to grieve, crying, "Lord, I believe:
Help Thou mine unbelief!"

Linger a little, invisible host
Of the unknown saints who stand
Perhaps not far off, though men may scoff;
Touch me with unfelt hand.

But my own, my own, ye are holding me fast
With the human clasp that I knew;
Through the chorus clear your voices I hear,
And I am singing with you.

Ah, they melt away as the music dies;
Back comes the world's work, hard, plain;
But God lifted in grace the veil from His face,
And it smiled, "Thou shalt find them again."

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XXII.

AMERICAN girls begin to make much of physical culture. As their refinement advances they see how much of their value in society depends on the nerve and spirits which accompany thorough development. It is not enough that they know how to dance languidly, and carry themselves in company. To distinguish herself, a young belle must know how to row, swim, skate, ride, and even shoot, to say nothing of lessons in fencing, which noble ladies in Germany, and some of foreign family here, take to develop sureness and agility. The heavy, flat-footed creature who can not walk across a room without betraying the bad terms her joints are on with each other must have a splendid face and fortune to keep any place in the world, no matter how good her family, or how varied her acquirements, even if she speaks seven languages like a native, and has played sonatas since she was eight years old. A woman's value depends entirely on her use to the world, and especially to that person who happens to have the most of her society. A man likes the society of a woman who can walk to see an interesting view, and take journeys without being laid up by them; he likes smooth motions, round arms and throat, head held straight, and shoulders that do not bow out. When you realize that a fine figure must be a straight line from the roots of the hair to the base of the shoulder-blade, you will see how few women, even of those who are admired, approach this high-bred ideal. Special culture, indeed, is discerned where such excellence of line meets the eye. The polished races of the East, who, untutored and degraded, yet have the entail of antique subtlety and art, possess such figures along with the proverbs of sages and the fragments of palace mosaics. The best-born of all countries have this noble set of head, this lance-like figure, and easy play of limb. As surely as right thoughts and manners can be induced, so the motions and poise of limb can be trained to correctness. The work must begin early. A girl should be put in training as soon as she passes from the plumpness of childhood into the ugly age. The mother should inspect her dressing to see what physical development is needed, and stimulate the child by the desire to possess beautiful limbs and figure. The senses are awake early to the sense of grace. There is no better way to inspire a girl with it than to take her to picture-galleries, and show her the faces of historical beauties, or the figures of Italian sculpture, and ask her if she would not like to own the same fine points in her own body. This substitutes the love of art for that of admiration, and makes self-cultivation too deep a thing for mere vanity.

There is a time when girls are awkward, indolent, and capricious. Their boisterous spirits at one time, their sickly minauderies at another, are very trying to mother and teacher. The cause is set down as depravity, when it is only nature. Girls are lapsided and indolent because they are weak or languid, between which and laziness there is a vast difference. They have demanding appetites that strike grown people with wonder, and go frantic on short notice when their wishes are crossed. Mother, your growing girl is weak. The nursery bath Saturday night is not enough. Encourage her to take a sponge-bath every day. When she comes in heated from a long walk or play, see that she bathes her knees and elbows and feet in cold water, to prevent her growing nervous with fatigue when the excitement is over. See to it that she is not too warmly dressed, and that she does not suffer from cold, remembering a plump, active child will suffer with heat under the clothes it takes to keep you comfortable; and if she is thin and sensitive, care must be taken against sudden chills. Keep her on very simple but well-flavored diet, with plenty of sour fruit, if she craves it, for the young have a facility for growing bilious, which acids correct. Sweet pickles not too highly spiced are favorites with children, and are better than sweetmeats. Nuts and raisins are more wholesome than candies. New cheese and cream are to be preferred to butter with bread and vegetables. Soup and a little of the best and juiciest meat should be given at dinner. But this miscellaneous stuffing that half-grown girls are allowed to indulge in ruins their complexion, temper, and digestion. No coffee or tea should be taken by any human being till it is full-grown. The excitement of young nerves by these drinks is more than the benefit derived from them. Besides, the luxury and the stimulus are greater to the adult when debarred from these things through childhood. Neither mind nor body should be worked till maturity. Children will do all they ought in study and work without much urging; and they will learn and keep more in two hours of study to five of play than if the order is inverted. Say to a child, Get this lesson and you may go to play, and you will be astonished to see how rapidly it learns; but if one lesson is to succeed another till six dreary hours have dragged away, it loses heart, and learns merely what can not well be helped. A girl under eighteen ought not to practice at the piano or sit at a desk more than three-quarters of an hour at a time. Then she should run out-of-doors ten minutes, or exercise, to relieve the nerves. An adult never ought to study or sit more than an hour without brief change before passing to the next. This keeps the head clearer, the limbs fresher, and carries one through a day with less fatigue than if one worked eight hours and then rested four.

I do not share the prejudice against braces and backboards for keeping the figure straight, especially when young. It is instinctive with barbarous nations to use such aids in compelling erectness in their children. These appliances need not be painful in the least, but rather give tender muscles and bones welcome relief. Languid girls should take cool sitz-baths to strengthen the muscles of the back and hips, more than ordinarily susceptible of fatigue when childhood is left. But never talk of a girl's feelings in mind or body before her, or suffer her to dwell on them. The effect is bad physically and mentally. See that these injunctions are obeyed implicitly; spare her the whys and wherefores. It is enough for her to know that she will feel better for them. Of all things, deliver us from valetudinarians of fifteen. Never laugh at them; never sneer; never indulge them in self-condolings. Be pitiful and sympathetic, but steadily turn their attention to something interesting outside of themselves. Special means are essential to special growth. Throwing quoits and sweeping are good exercises to develop the arms. There is nothing like three hours of house-work a day for giving a woman a good figure, and if she sleeps in tight cosmetic gloves she need not fear her hands will be spoiled. The time to form the hands is in youth, and with thimbles for the finger-tips, and close gloves lined with cold cream, every mother might secure a good hand for her daughter. She should be particular to see that long-wristed lisle-thread gloves are drawn on every time the girl goes out. Veils she should discard, except in cold and windy weather, when they should be drawn close over the head. A broad-leafed hat for the country is protection enough for the summer; the rest of the year the complexion needs all the sun it can get.

There is commonly a want of fullness in the muscles of the shoulder which give its graceful curve. This is best developed by the use of the skipping-rope in swinging it over the head, and by battledoor, which keeps the arms extended, at the same time using the muscles of the neck and shoulders. Swinging by the hands from a rope with a stick crossed in the end is capital, and so is swinging from a bar. These muscles are the last to receive exercise in common modes of life, and playing ball, bean-bags or pillow fights, are convenient ways of using them. Singing scales with corsets off, shoulders thrown back, lungs deeply inflated, mouth wide open, and breath held, is the best tuition for insuring that fullness to the upper part of the chest which gives majesty to a figure even when the bust is meagre. These scales should be practiced half an hour morning and afternoon, gaining two ends at once, increase of voice and perfection of figure.

This brings us to the inquiries made by more than one correspondent for some means of developing the bust. Every mother should pay attention to this before her daughters think of such a thing for themselves, by seeing that their dresses are never in the least constricted across the chest, and that a foolish dress-maker never puts padding into their waists. This horrible custom of wearing pads is the ruin of natural figures, by heating and pressing down the bosom. This most delicate and sensitive part of a woman's form must always be kept cool, and well supported by a linen corset. The open-worked ones are by far the best, and the compression, if any, should not be, as it generally is, over the heart and fixed ribs, but just at the waist, for not more than the width of a broad waistband. Six inches of thick coutil over the heart and stomach, those parts of the body that have most vital heat, must surely disorder them and affect the bust as well. It would be better if the coutil were over the shoulders or the abdomen, and the whalebones of the corset held together by broad tapes, so that there would be less dressing over the heart, instead of more. A low, deep bosom is a sign of grace in a full-grown woman, and a full bust is hardly admirable in an unmarried girl, whose figure should be full of curves, but slender, promising a fuller beauty when maturity is reached. One is not fond of overripe pears.

Flat figures are best dissembled by puffed and shirred blouse-waists, or by corsets with a fine rattan run in the top of the bosom gore, which throws out the fullness sufficiently to look well in a plain corsage. Of all things India rubber pads are most injurious, by sweating the skin constantly, and ruining the bust beyond hope of restoration. To improve its outlines, wear a linen corset fitting so close at the end of the top gores as to support the bosom well; and for this the corset must be fitted to the skin, and worn next the under-flannel. Night and morning sponge the bust in the coldest water—sponging it upward, but never down. Madame Celnart relates that the bayaderes of India cultivate their forms by wearing a cincture of linen under the breasts, and at night chafing them lightly with a piece of linen. The breasts should never be touched but with the utmost delicacy, as other treatment renders them weak and flaccid, and not unfrequently results in cancer. A baby's bite has more than once inflicted this horror upon its mother. But one thing is to be solemnly cautioned—that no human being, doctor, nurse, nor even the mother herself, on any pretense, save in case of accident, be allowed to touch a girl's figure. It would be unnecessary to say this were not French nurses, especially old and experienced ones, sometimes in the habit of stroking the figures of young girls committed to their charge, with the idea of thus developing them. This is not a thing mentioned from hearsay. Mothers can not be too careful how they leave their children with even well-meaning servants. A young girl's body is more sensitive than any harp is to the air that plays upon it. Nature, free, uneducated, and direct, responds to every touch on that seat of the nerves, the bosom, by a normal excitement that is simply ruinous to a child's nervous system, and should be guarded against by all means. Girls are very different about their feelings, and some affectionate, innocent, hearty natures remain through their lives as simple as when they were babes taking their bath under their mother's hands, while others, equally innocent but more susceptible, require to be guarded and sheltered even from the violence of a caress as from contagion and pain.

Due attention to the general health always has its effect in restoring the bust to its roundness. It is a mistake that it is irremediably injured by nursing children. A babe may be taught not to pinch and bite its mother, and the exercise of a natural function can injure her in no way, if proper care is taken to sustain the system at the same time. Cold compresses of wet linen worn over the breast are very soothing and beneficial, provided they do not strike a chill to a weak chest, and the cincture should be carefully adjusted. Weakness of any kind tells on the contour of the figure, and it is useless to try to improve it in any other way than restoring the strength when it is wanting. Tepid sitz-baths strengthen the muscles of the hips, and do away with that dragging which acts on and injures the firmness of the bosom. Bathing in water to which ammonia is added strengthens the skin, but the use of camphor to dry away the milk after weaning a child is reprehensible. No drying or heating lotions of any kind should ever be applied.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

"THE fashions remain the same as a whole, and vary only in details." Such is the telegraphic dispatch which I should send to Harper's Bazar did I correspond with it through the Atlantic cable instead of by mail. These few words sum up in part the state of Parisian modes: stagnation as to the fundamental principles, fancy and change alone in the ornaments. The latter in diversity and numbers surpass enumeration as well as exact analysis. But should the question be asked, What is the fashion? it might be answered, indifferently, Nothing at all.

A too faithful image of the political divisions of the country, fashion, like France, is powerless to escape from the domain of the provisional, since any thing definite, no matter what, encounters equal opposition from all sides. It is like a wagon with horses harnessed at both ends, and condemned to remain stationary through the forces that draw it in contrary directions. This is why there is no important change either in fashion or in politics, and why the same garments are worn year after year, varying only in details.

Perhaps there is also another reason for this stagnation, namely, that the fashions were never so pretty, more picturesque, and more becoming than since the day of the adoption of costumes; that is, of draped garments differing in fabric and even in color from the skirts.

Velvet and satin, but, above all, velvet and cloth, are the favorite combinations this winter. As a matter of course the two fabrics are not only of the same color, but also of the same shade, the difference of light and shade caused by the difference of fabrics being the sole effect sought by this combination. The prettiest dress of this kind that I have seen was composed as follows:

Skirt of plum-colored cloth, trimmed on the bottom with a very deep flounce composed of alternate clusters of four pleats of silk and four pleats of velvet. This trimming was interrupted on each side of the tablier by a quille of puffed velvet. A quille, we should say, is a trimming which extends the whole length of the skirt, and which is wider at the bottom than at the top, forming a sort of triangle, blunt at the upper part. Over-skirt of plum-colored velvet, trimmed with fringe. Spencer with flat basques, of plum-colored cloth, with velvet sleeves. The neck of the spencer was trimmed with a wide ruche of velvet, lined with cloth.

This costume is made in all shades of the two fabrics. For the street a Dolman of black velvet, or, which is more elegant, of velvet of the same color as the dress, is added. The Dolman is made with large, square, slashed sleeves, and is trimmed with a band of silver-fox.

The fancy gives itself full play with respect to trimmings. For instance, elegant wrappings, especially Dolmans, are covered with embroidery of black or white silk, which perfectly simulates rich black or white lace applied on the Dolman. The black embroidery is wrought on Dolmans of some dark color, gros bleu, Russian green, or bronze. The white embroidery is on pink, blue, or lilac Dolmans, destined for evening wear, especially for concerts, or theatres, or operas. The same kind of embroidery in écru silk is wrought on violet or blue Dolmans of a medium shade for carriage toilettes. Black embroidery alone is used for walking dresses.

People are emancipating themselves both in the direction of economy and wealth. Dresses that formerly would never have been seen in the daytime are worn now without scruple by the most fastidious. And a combination very favorable to economy, but of late despised and condemned as opposed to good taste—that is, a black velvet wrapping worn over a colored dress—is adopted now by the most elegant women. As to the dresses that were formerly thought too conspicuous for day wear, the following is an example. I will add that it was made for a lady who is by no means eccentric in her tastes.

Dress of black velvet, trimmed with a flounce lined with pink satin, set on with a very wide heading, turned down so as to show the pink lining. Polonaise of black velvet, trimmed with white blonde, which was covered with black lace of the same width. This polonaise, which opened over a high vest of pink satin, was furnished with pleated basques, with pink satin lining. Broad sash of double-faced satin ribbon, black on one side and pink on the other. This was a visiting dress. It is quite certain that no one would have ventured to wear it in the daytime a few years ago.

Among quieter costumes, but still very elegant, must be cited those made of faille and cloth. The faille skirt has its trimmings, whatever they may be, flounces or folds, bound with cloth of a darker shade of the same color. The cloth over-skirt is trimmed with bands of faille, like the skirt. The waist, which is a sort of little double-breasted hunting jacket, is made of faille, with revers, collar, and bands of cloth. The effect is charming.

A few ball dresses are in preparation, for the French would dance on a volcano. Here, too, the effect is chiefly sought in the draping of over-skirts, the combination of stuffs, and the association of different colors and shades. I will describe some of these dresses.

Dress of maize faille. The tablier is covered with lengthwise puffs, separated by pipings of purple satin. The sides of the skirt are covered with perpendicular pleats, while the back breadths are trimmed with three flounces bound with purple satin. This makes three different kinds of trimming on one skirt. Over-skirt of maize tulle, entirely covered with a trellis with very large meshes made of small rolls of purple satin. This over-skirt is drawn backward, and draped with a triple pouf, across the three tiers of which is wound a broad purple satin sash. The over-skirt is trimmed besides with maize feather fringe. Low waist, with a double row of maize feather fringe simulating a bertha, and a purple bow on each shoulder. The bow on the left shoulder has no ends, while that on the right is double, and is finished with two long ends of ribbon. Diadem and comb of purple coral. Purple coral necklace.

Under dress of light green satin, worn under six skirts of light green tulle, each skirt being double. A large bow of a darker shade of green velvet loops each skirt on the left side. At the bottom of the low waist is a triple pouf of green tulle.

Numerous simple toilettes are in preparation for young girls and young married ladies. The first are made of white organdy, worn over dresses of white silk, as lustrous as possible. They are generally composed of two or three white organdy skirts, each trimmed with a pleated flounce. When this flounce is gathered, it is edged with green, pink, or blue faille. The third skirt is turned back to form the inevitable pouf. If the dress is trimmed with green faille, or if the flounces, being pleated, do not need colored trimming, one or two rows of green grass fringe are set on the waist in the guise of a bertha, and a bunch of flowers on the shoulders. The coiffure is of grass and flowers to match.

For ball coiffures there are many wreaths of flowers, to which belong a shoulder bouquet, which is set on the left shoulder, and terminates in a trailing spray, thus forming a sort of cascade of flowers, extending from the coiffure to the shoulder, and falling below the latter. For simple ball dresses for young married ladies white cotton tulle is employed; this fabric is less impalpable than silk tulle, and requires a smaller volume of trimmings. Let us hope that it will be with too complicated trimmings as with all things here below—that they will die of excess.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

Hosted by Google

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

BY F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER XXV.

A SERMON.

THE reputed wealth of Simon Culwick, of Sedge Hill, Worcester, his position in the county, or his opinion of himself, did not exercise any restraint upon the peculiarities of the young woman who confronted him, who leaned across the table, and unceremoniously snatched from his hands the painting that she had placed between them. There was no respect for persons in the mind of Lucy Jennings, especially when her blood was up.

"What do you mean by nothing of the sort?" she exclaimed; and at the ominous flashing of her eyes Simon Culwick's lower jaw dropped. "Haven't you come in all humility and kindness and Christian charity to this house?"

"Certainly not," said Mr. Culwick, making a stand for it.

"Not to take Reuben back to your home?"

"No."

"Not to reinstate him?"

"No."

"To wound him and his pride afresh, perhaps?"

"That's very likely."

"Sit down, please, while I talk to you," said Lucy, very feverishly; and at the young woman's excitement Mr. Culwick glared in mute amazement. He subsided into the easy-chair at her suggestion, however, and Lucy Jennings laid the picture on the table, took a chair facing him, and planted her thin hands on her knees.

"Have you ever thought what is to become of you, old man, when you are closer to the grave than you are now?"

"Eh?" said Simon Culwick.

"When you are dying, and all your pride and wealth are not worth that," she continued, with a quick snap of her fingers, so close to his face that he winced and drew back his head with alacrity.

"When all the money which you have made will not afford you one moment's comfort," she went on, "and all the dark deeds of your life will rise up to appall you."

Mr. Culwick turned pale, and breathed hard. He was not prepared for this onslaught; he was wholly dumfounded.

"When you will be alone, awfully alone, without one good thought of your life for a sinking soul like yours to rest a hope upon. Mercy of Heaven, man, have you not given one thought to all this?"

"You—you wretched woman!" cried Mr. Culwick, finding breath to reply, and clutching the arms of the chair with both hands and shaking them in his rage, "how dare you speak to me! Do you know that—that I have never been talked to in this way in my life—that this is an unwarrantable liberty from one in your position to one in mine?"

"I don't care for your position," cried Lucy Jennings; "I wouldn't change my position for yours for twice your money—for fifty times all that you have hoarded together, and hardened your soul with. What are you but a selfish old sinner, who broke his wife's heart, and turned an only son out-of-doors, and who must stand before his God—ay, sooner than he thinks, perhaps"—she added, with an angry bang upon the table that shook the whole house, and took Mr. Jennings down stairs with a headlong plunge, under the impression that his stock had exploded—"to answer for both crimes?"

"Look here," shouted Simon Culwick, "I have had enough of this."

"You will hear me out," said Lucy, backing against the door with her chair, as he rose from his seat. "You have come of your own free-will to this house, where no one is likely to be afraid of you. You are here boasting of your want of sympathy and affection, bragging of the possibility of wounding one afresh whose life you have already darkened, and I will tell you what is to become of you hereafter."

"You are a fanatic. You're raving mad," said Simon Culwick, dropping into his seat again.

"My mission has been among much poverty and crime, and I have grown old and irritable in my efforts to preach and pray to those who hate to listen."

"I should think they did."

"But in all my life's experience," she continued, without heeding him, "I have not met a man so full of uncharitableness as you."

"You know nothing about me—you—"

"Don't interrupt me. Listen for a few minutes, and then say what you will."

Simon Culwick ground his teeth; but he did not interfere again. She was certainly mad; and it was wise policy, he had heard, to allow mad people to have their own way, so far as it was consistent with personal safety. He had chanced upon a spitfire—a terrible woman who shrieked at him terrible things. It was his own fault for coming into low neighborhoods, and he must bear with it as best he might. He was not a religious man; he had not been inside a church since his marriage; he had not a Bible that he was aware of in his grand house at Sedge Hill; and this down-pour of religion, this facing him with hard truths and awful texts and horrid pictures of his future state, curdled his blood. The woman was a nightmare which he could not shake away; there was a terrible eloquence of description in her too, that commanded attention, cut down his pride, and shook his own confidence in his great grand self. All this might cling to his memory—though he would never own it, for her impudence—throughout all his after-years, till he came to his grave, concerning which the woman raved so freely. It was a bitter sermon, with no quarter in it, and he shut his eyes, and feigned to be asleep—a weak attempt at imposition, for he shuddered visibly after every sentence.

"There, I have no more to say," she exclaimed at last. "Now think of it, and do your duty, as I have done mine, before it is too late."

There was a slamming of the door, and he opened his eyes to find that his tormentor had gone. He rose at once, and took his hat.

"What a horrible creature!" he muttered. "I will not stop another moment."

He was half-way toward the door, when the picture attracted his attention again, and he stopped. It was his ruling passion now; success in business, present power, future happiness, were not upon his mind now in any great degree.

He went back to the picture, and knitted his brows at it, as a man might do intensely puzzled with a problem of more than ordinary difficulty; he took it to the window; he placed it on the table, and hid himself in the curtain folds, behind the light, to gaze at it; he put his hat on the floor, and sat down with the picture in front of him, and began rubbing it carefully with the palm of his hand; finally he thrust his hands into his pockets, and stared at it, forgetful of time and place, of his recent sermon, and of the main object of his visit. He was a man possessed by one idea.

There were feet ascending the stairs now, lightly and springily, and he might have remembered their echo if he had listened, but he was past listening. There was a voice he should have recollected as belonging to old days when he had been proud of his son and almost loved him, but he did not hear it. It was far beyond his dream world, upon which another "original" had dawned. It was only when the handle turned sharply and the door opened that he awoke to the consciousness of where he was, and what stalwart figure had come into the room from the world so different to his own.

"Father," said Reuben Culwick, as he advanced toward him.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE OLD IDEA.

THE son went toward his father in the same cordial manner which he had adopted in his memorable Worcester visit, and offered his hand to him. The father half hesitated, as in the old fashion, and then shook hands with Reuben coldly and limply. It was evident that warmth of heart had not brought him to Hope Street; there was no regret for past mistakes—for long years of disunion—to be detected in the greeting.

"You have come to see me, then," said Reuben, "and I am glad."

"You haven't much to be glad about at present," replied the father; "I was in the neighborhood, and I thought that I would call and see where you were lodging, and what you were doing. I haven't come from Worcester expressly to see you."

"It does not matter; pray don't apologize," said Reuben, lightly, as he took his seat at the desk, opened it, and glanced carelessly at the letters and papers which had arrived during his absence.

"I'm not apologizing. I never apologized to any one in my life. Why should I?"

"Why should you not, if you have done any one an injury?" was the calm rejoinder.

Reuben placed his papers aside, clasped his hands upon his desk, and regarded his father steadily. These two men never agreed; they seemed to have met even then especially to aggravate one another, thought Lucy, who had not been able to resist the temptation of taking her place on the mat outside the door. She was interested in the result of the interview. It was doubtful if Reuben would ever relate the particulars. It was not idle curiosity, but a deep concern for the welfare of her lodger, that placed her there as listener. Good might follow her full acquaintance with all the details, certainly no harm.

"I never did you an injury; you did all that you could to humiliate and defy me," said the father, quickly.

"It is hardly a clear statement of affairs, father, but I will not contest the argument. I called and apologized last May, if you remember."

"Humph, it was an apology," said the father, ironically.

Reuben did not reply. There was a quick answer on his tongue, but he repressed it. He had no more to say until his father had explained the object of his unlooked-for visit. He had no wish to irritate him; on the contrary, he would be glad to make peace, and end the unnatural difference between them, at any sacrifice except that of self-respect. If Simon Culwick had come of his own free-will, and in the fullness of his heart, he would be happy presently; but the nature of his greeting, the method of his address, warned him that it was not the father's love for a son that had brought them face to face. He had never been loved. The father had seen long ago his preference for the mother, and hated him for it; he was almost certain that Simon Culwick was without the power of loving any being upon earth, Simon Culwick, perhaps, excepted.

The father was not apparently in a hurry to state his business. Idle curiosity might have led him to the fire-work-maker's, for he said, after a long pause,

"This is a very wretched hovel for a man like you to exist in."

And his mother to die in, sternly and persistently refusing to the last to make any claim for assistance to her husband, Reuben could have added; but he kept back the retort which came uppermost in his mind.

"I have grown used to it," was the reply.

"You were brought up like a gentleman—you might have been a gentleman now—and yet you are in this hole."

"And still a gentleman, if you will allow me to say as much as that," added Reuben Culwick, significantly.

"You may call yourself what you like, but no gentleman would dream of living here."

"Some people have odd dreams."

"And as for that beast of a woman down stairs—the preaching, canting fury with the hatchet face—I'd hang myself sooner than live within twenty miles of her!" cried Simon Culwick. "If I had been a heathen, she could not have raved at me more."

The hatchet face against the outer panel of the door burned a little, but did not wince.

"Miss Jennings is a well-meaning but highly inconsiderate woman. What has she been saying to you?"

"What hasn't she been saying?" exclaimed his father. "I have been insulted—I have been treated with the grossest disrespect."

"Has she been pleading in my interest?"

"She has been making a fool of herself altogether."

"Has she been pleading in my interest?" he asked again.

"Yes—in her way."

"That was a grave mistake. It was officious and unwise, and I apologize for her intermeddling," said Reuben; "she is a poor woman who knows no better, I assure you."

Lucy Jennings clasped her hands together, and sank her head upon her breast. He had not a good word for her even then!

"She is not the only champion you have in this house; there's that girl Eastbell, too. Who on earth would have thought of her being here?"

"She's one of my clients. But she hasn't said any thing to you?"

"She has said a great deal too much."

"Now, bravo, Second-cousin Sarah! What did she say, father; what was her style of treating the question?"

"Ask her; you don't think I have recollected all the cursed nonsense that I have heard in this place."

"You can not have forgotten it; yours is an excellent memory," said Reuben, dryly.

"Ay, for many things—for hard words spoken against me—for injuries committed, and for favors despised, especially."

"You never forgive them."

"Why should I?"

"There is something about forgiving that kind of thing in a prayer my mother taught me," said Reuben, very bitterly now.

The bitterness of his father's words had brought about his own, and he was a man of no degree of caution. He knew that the mention of his mother's name would anger the sullen being from whom the mother had separated, but he spoke out defiantly.

"I don't care about your mother's prayers," Simon Culwick cried, furiously; "the result of what she taught you has been proved by your vile disobedience to me."

"What she taught me we need not discuss at this late hour," was the son's reply. "Tell me what has brought you here, Mr. Culwick."

Simon Culwick hesitated still. It was no easy matter to explain the motive which had set him down in Hope Street, and the big eyebrows lowered again over the eyes.

"I have been thinking a great deal about you lately," he said at last. "You have bothered me."

"Indeed!"

"You came to Sedge Hill—you were the first to write to me—the first to make advances."

"Yes."

"And although calling on me only proved that you were as obstinate as ever—that we should never get on," he continued—"still I accepted it as an apology."

"Or in the spirit in which it was meant," said Reuben; "say that."

"And it struck me," he added, without saying it, "that there was some amount of respect for me in your heart, possibly some regret for all that has parted us."

"Well?"

"Well," echoed back the father, "if so, we might get on after all. Who knows? I don't say that I can ever forgive you—that I am ever likely to forget—that I have even an idea of altering my will; all that depends upon yourself."

"Well?" said Reuben, deeply interested.

"You remember what we quarreled about?"

"Perfectly."

"I wanted you to marry Miss Holland."

"Yes."

"That is the girl whom you saw at my house last May."

"Yes."

"Then," he said, after a strange fighting with his breath, "marry her now, and I'll forget every thing!"

CHAPTER XXVII.

VERY SUDDEN.

REUBEN was prepared for many strange reasons for his father's presence in Hope Street, but this one took him completely off his guard. He sat back and glared at his father.

"You don't answer me," said Simon Culwick, in his old sullen and aggrieved tone of voice.

"Not at a moment's notice," was the answer. "It is hardly my way. But—"

"Go on," said the father, impatiently, as Reuben paused.

"Why do you wish me to marry this lady?"

"Because I made up my mind that she should be your wife five years ago. Didn't I say so then? Haven't I said to myself a hundred times," he added, between his closed teeth, "that you should do as I wished, or starve?"

"Pardon me, Mr. Culwick, but I am not obliged to starve because your wishes and mine do not assimilate," Reuben replied, with grave politeness.

"Your mother set you against her, out of aggravation because she discovered that I wished the match—for no other reason, I swear," said the father. "Now consider this and let me know. Take five minutes, while I look at this picture again."

"Thank you, Sir," said Reuben, very calmly; "I will take five minutes, as you suggest. It's a short grace, but I shall have made up my mind by that time."

The father did not, or would not, perceive the irony of the reply, and he bent his face over the picture while Reuben sat and regarded him. There was no doubt or anxiety on Reuben Culwick's countenance as he gazed at his father; he only seemed to have made a study of the big man before him, and to be interested in him rather than in his own chance of aggrandizement. He looked at his watch, in a business sort of way, and when the five minutes had expired he said,

"You have no further reason to urge why I should marry Miss Holland?"

"It was my wish years ago," the father said, imperiously.

"Very well," answered Reuben, "then I must decline to marry the lady."

"You—you fool!" blurted forth the father.

"There are many who would be of your opinion," said Reuben, coolly; "for you are a rich man whose crotchets are worth studying, and Miss Holland is a pretty young woman, and appears to be amiable. Still, Sir," leaning across the desk again as in the early period of their interview, "I will not marry her."

"So much the worse for you," said the father.

"So much the worse for my worldly advantages, for my chance of your money," said Reuben, shrugging his shoulders; "yes, I see that, and the prospect does not dismay me. I have been flung too long upon my own resources to be alarmed at it, and it was you, my own father, who cast me on the world."

"For rank disobedience—remember that."

"For believing in my mother, who was a woman grievously wronged. Will you remember that too?" he said.

"I will not hear a word about your mother. She was—"

"And I will not hear a word against her in the house where she died," cried Reuben, so sternly now that the father held his peace, cowed, perhaps for the first time in his life, by the son's severity of manner.

"I don't want your money," Reuben continued. "I should have been glad once of your affection, but I don't see my way to that any more clearly than I have done. And as for my future, I will make it for myself. I have done without your help all my life, and, please God, I will go on without it to the end."

"Go," said the father.

"It is the road of my own choosing, and I have friends to wish me godspeed," Reuben continued; "I shall be happier following my own pursuits than truckling to you for your money's sake. I never cared for your money, by Heaven! I despised it."

"You have said that before."

"I can earn my own living."

"So can a carpenter," said the old man.

"I have no ties; I have lost one little girl who was very dear to me, and whom I found more desolate than I was; and my ambitions lie so far away from yours that they can never possibly cross."

"I am not paying any attention," Mr. Culwick senior remarked. "Will you marry Miss Holland or not?"

"I have already respectfully declined the offer of the lady's hand."

Simon Culwick rose, buttoned up his coat, and set his hat firmly on his head.

"Good-morning to you."

"One moment. Is Miss Holland aware of your proposition?"

"Certainly not."

"I am very glad of it."

"I don't see any thing to be glad of," said Mr. Culwick, as he walked toward the door, where he paused, and looked at the picture. "I had forgotten that," he muttered, as he returned to the table, and where Reuben was standing the instant afterward with the picture in his hand.

"You will pardon me, but Mr. Jennings will not sell this portrait."

"He has already—"

"Mr. Jennings will not sell it, I assure you," said Reuben, with great urbanity of manner, as he bowed once more to his father with the picture pressed to his breast.

The father's face grew very dark again.

"It is because you think that the picture pleases me that you try to thwart me in a petty affair of this kind, even," said Simon Culwick; "you would oppose me at every turn if you could; you would kill me if you dared."

"Mr. Jennings will not sell the picture until he has taken advice upon it," said Reuben, without offering any defense to his father's reproach.

"Advice!"

"It appears to me a murky daub enough, but then daubs sell if they're old," said Reuben; "and the desire of an eminent picture collector to add it to his gallery engenders a certain amount of curiosity respecting it."

"It would cost twenty pounds to restore. Where are these fire-work-makers to get twenty pounds?"

"I will lend them the sum if it's necessary."

"You?"

"To be sure. I am of a saving turn, and by next post I expect twenty-five pounds that I shall not know what to do with."

"And you will not let me take that picture

Hosted by Google

"HE PUT HIS HAT ON THE FLOOR AND SAT DOWN, WITH THE PICTURE IN FRONT OF HIM."

away; you oppose me in this too?" he said, between his set teeth.

"It seems to be my mission in life to oppose you in every thing," said Reuben, satirically, "and I have been particularly unfortunate this morning. I can not take a wife of your selection at a moment's notice, and I can not allow you to make a good bargain at the expense of my own friends."

"I don't believe you have a friend in the world: your miserable temper wouldn't let you have any."

"Ah! I have been of that opinion myself, more than once in my life."

"It's my belief that I hate you worse than ever I did," said the father, as he walked down stairs, followed by his son with the picture under his arm.

"I am sorry to hear it," answered Reuben.

Mr. Culwick senior descended the stairs with extreme care, and passed through the parlor and shop without bestowing any further attention upon Mr. Jennings or Sarah Eastbell. Standing at the shop door was Lucy Jennings, who was studying the houses on the opposite side of the way with great intentness.

"Will you allow me to pass, madam?" he said, gruffly, to her.

Miss Jennings stood aside as requested, and as he passed her, she said, in a low tone,

"Try to remember how close you may be to your grave before you leave this house as wicked a man as you entered it."

He glared at her defiantly; his fingers even closed upon the stick, as if the idea of striking her with it had suggested itself; then he stopped and put his face close to hers, eagerly and confidentially.

"A ten-pound note for that picture, and I'll take it away with me."

"You will take nothing away with you but our contempt," said Lucy, banging the door behind him, and shutting him out in the front garden, down which he proceeded slowly.

He turned in the direction of the Camberwell New Road, but altered his mind, and passed the house again, looking up at the window of the first floor, and even hesitating, as if the idea of re-entering had struck him; then he went on to Walworth Road, where he lost himself, and where his irritation broke forth into sundry awful oaths when every fresh direction he received only bewildered him, and led him into a deeper maze of streets. It was very strange, but presently he could not attend to the directions which were given him; they made his head ache, and rendered him so giddy that once or twice he stopped to recover himself before he had the strength to proceed. He gave up asking the way to London Bridge after a while, and looked on in a purposeless fashion that was new to him, until he found himself standing by a lamp-post in a crowded thoroughfare, thinking of his son and then of his dead wife—which was very strange indeed—and then of Mary Holland, down in Worcestershire.

A Hansom-cab drew up in front of him, and the driver bent himself from his seat in his direction.

"Cab, sir?" inquired the man.

"Yes," said Simon Culwick.

He did not marvel at his own folly in not calling a cab before; he stepped into it with difficulty, and would have dropped off to sleep at once, had not the driver asked through the trap in what direction he should drive.

"I don't know," said Simon Culwick, taking off his hat, and putting one big hand to his forehead.

"Aren't you well, Sir?" asked the cabman.

"I'm very well, thank you; how are you?" said Mr. Culwick, absently.

"Oh, I'm all right. Where to, Sir?" asked the cabman.

"To my boy's."

"Where does he live?"

"I can't remember. Oh, don't ask me to think!" said Mr. Culwick, piteously, and with his thick lower lip quivering.

"This is a blessed rum start," muttered the cabman. "Can't you recollect any place where I can take you?"

"No."

"Ain't you got no friends?"

"No."

"Then hook it out of my cab, old man, and ask a perliceman to take care of you."

Mr. Simon Culwick did not move, and the cabman was about to expostulate more forcibly with him, when he said,

"Sedge Hill."

"Sedge 'Ill! Where's that?"

"Straight on."

"Oh, you mean Ludgate 'Ill."

"As fast as you can go."

"All right."

The cabman whipped his horse, and drove off.

"How drunk he is!" said the cabman.

Mr. Simon Culwick had not touched wine or spirits that day. It was not he who had given way, but something at the brain of the man who had been so strong and hard only that morning, and whose strength and obduracy might have been but the slow oncoming of his malady.

Still he was only a trifle giddy, he thought, as he dismissed the cab at the corner of Fleet Street, after paying his fare in a rational manner. His memory was bad, too, and he stood for a while against the obelisk in the middle of the road, trying to recollect why he had come to Ludgate Hill—why he had quarreled again with his son Reuben—why he was so long a distance from him when he seemed to need suddenly and strangely his protection and affection.

"Hope Lodge, Camberwell!"

Yes, he was better. That was the place where Reuben lived, and that awful woman-preacher—where the picture was—a real Opie, as he was a living man! He would go back to Reuben and to the picture at once, while his memory was fresh. He was an old man, and terribly alone in the world, and the picture was worth two or three hundred pounds, and Reuben had not promised to marry Mary Holland yet. He stepped into the road, and made for the opposite side of the way. There were wagons and omnibuses and carts coming in all directions, and their drivers shouted at him, and foot-passengers screamed wildly at the danger which he had not seen for himself. His giddiness had overmastered him again, and he fell amidst clattering, stumbling iron hoofs, and whirling, grinding wheels, and it was beyond man's help to save him.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

VISITING TOILETTE.

THIS elegant toilette for visiting is composed of plum-colored velvet and silk, with a border of otter fur. The short silk skirt has a deep box-pleated velvet flounce, showing a facing of silk at the top. The over-skirt of silk has a short wrinkled apron front and ample train with otter border. The long basquine has a pleated back, Dolman sleeves, and fur trimming. Plum velvet Normandy bonnet, with an ostrich ruche inside, and small yellow lilies. Buff kid gloves.

VISITING TOILETTE.

Hosted by Google

THE LAST OF ENGLAND.

THE saddest moment in an emigrant's career is that when, the bustle of preparation over, and the embarkation once made, he watches the shores of his country as they recede from his gaze, and realizes that he has crossed the Rubicon, from which there is no return. For the nonce the bright hopes of a prosperous life in a new world are forgotten, and his only emotion is a yearning for the home which he has abandoned for evermore, but to which his heart clings in proportion as he retreats from it. It is fortunate in some measure that he usually has little time to brood over his grief, but is forced to forget his homesickness in the more prosaic mal de mer, which leaves little thought for sentimental woes, and which makes him the first day afraid that he shall die, and the next afraid that he shall not, so undesirable will life by that time have grown to him. In the accompanying beautiful engraving we see a group of emigrants huddled on deck, and with eager gaze seeing the last of Old England. The two figures in the foreground are particularly worthy of note. The sad-faced woman clasps her hands and fixes her mournful eyes wistfully on the beloved shore which she never more expects to see, while her husband pulls his hat over his brows and lets his head fall upon his breast in an agony of mute despair. Behind them a young girl peers over their shoulders to catch a last glimpse of England. A woman turns away and buries her face in her hands, and a child munches an apple as she gazes at the coast with a vague feeling of sadness. Let us hope that in their Western home they may find cause to rejoice that they had the courage to sunder old ties, and take passage in the Eldorado.

CURIOSITIES OF SUPERSTITION.

LOUIS NAPOLEON in his will emphasizes the solemn declaration: "With regard to my son, let him keep as a talisman the seal I used to wear attached to my watch." This piece of fetichism would appear to have formed another link between the late emperor and the Latin races, whose cause he affected to represent, whose superstition he certainly shared. Indeed, the old Romans degraded a priest because his mitre fell, and unmade a dictator because a rat squeaked. Cæsar crossed the Rubicon because, on the opposite bank, he saw a man with a fine figure. His nephew felt confident of winning the battle of Actium because he met a peasant of the name of Nicolaus mounted on an ass. Wolsey was warned of his doom by a crosier-head; Sejanus, by a flight of crows. Dr. Johnson objected to going under a ladder. Montaigne avoided giving his left foot priority in putting on his stockings. Alexander was believed to have untied the Gordian knot with a slice of his sword. For good luck's sake Augustus wore some portion of a sea-calf; Charlemagne, some trinket of unknown value. Mohammed was all Fate; Bonaparte all Star and Destiny. Cromwell believed in September 3, and Louis Napoleon in December 2. Sulla called himself Felix, the favored Child of Fortune, and Timoleon turned his house into a Temple of Chance. Alexander was terrified by blood flowing from inside his soldiers' bread during the siege of Tyre in 332 B.C. His seer, Aristander, foresaw in this crimson efflux of the vital stream out of the commissariat a happy issue for the Macedonians; and the warriors, thus nerved, took Tyre.

From the year 1004 the alarming spectacle of the bleeding Host, and bread, as well as the bewitched bloody milk, several times in each century gave simple folk a scare; thus it was noticed in 1264, under Urban IV., at Bolsena, not far from Civita Vecchia; and Raphael has taken this for the subject of his picture called the "Miraculo de Bolsena," which is, at all events, a miracle of the pencil. In 1383, when Heinrich von Bulow destroyed the village and church at Wilsnack, drops of blood were found eight days afterward on the Host placed on the altar. But the victims of superstition have the bump of causality remarkably developed; and in 1510, thirty-eight Jews were burned to ashes because they had tortured the consecrated Host until it bled. Again the sight was seen on the Moselle in 1824; and in 1848 the famous Ehrenberg analyzed the terrible portent. After stooping with his microscope over the red stains on bread, cheese, and potatoes, this savant declared that they are caused by small monads or vibrios, which have a red color, and are so minute that from 46,656,000,000 to 884,736,000,000,000 distinct beings adorn the space of one square inch.

No doubt there was a deal of imposture in alchemy; no doubt, too, the wish for gold was father to the thought of alchemy; but this in itself will not account for Henry IV. prohibiting alchemy; for God-fearing Henry VI. eagerly encouraging it; for Pope John XXII. being an alchemist; for Louis XIII. of France making a Franciscan monk his grand almoner as the reward of a hundred years' reign promised to his credulity by that pretender to the discovery of the grand elixir; or for Jean de Lisle expiating by an early death in the Bastile his bold attempts to persuade Louis XIV. and his ministers that he possessed the gold-making stone. Among the wide circle of influential believers that alchemy thus entranced were Roger Bacon, Albertus Magnus, and St. Thomas Aquinas, and even the transcendent intellects of Leibnitz, Spinoza, and Verulam. However, in the pursuit of this phantom, Roger Bacon casually stumbled on the composition of gunpowder; Geber, on the properties of acids; Van Helmont, on the nature of gas—geist or spirit; and Dr. Glauber, of Amsterdam, on the uses of the salt which bears his name. Thus was the alchemist the victim of fetichism, the slave of superstition, the worshiper of science, the conqueror of power.

How much of alchemy was an imposture, how much of it was an enthusiasm, it is impossible to say. The secular practice of the science may be gleaned from M. Geoffrey's demonstration before the Royal Academy of Sciences in 1722, that alchemy was a matter of false-bottomed crucibles, hollow wands filled with gold, perforated lead, and soldered nails. The religious theory of the science may be gathered from Faber's Propugnaculum Alchymiæ, published in 1644, wherein occurs the statement: "The stone of the philosophers is, by all the authors who have treated of it, esteemed to be the greatest gift of God on earth. As, therefore, it is so mighty a gift of God, the most necessary thing, in order that man should attain to a knowledge of its excellence and worth, is wisdom, which is bestowed by God on very few." Macaulay praises Verulam for his "fruit," his aim at substantial results. The meteoric iron which fell at Agram, in Croatia, was capable of being forged into nails—a meteor which ought to be known as Bentham's meteor. Judged, however, by results, as Lowe would say, Roger Bacon's gunpowder-producing alchemy has not been an unalloyed blessing to mankind.

THE LAST OF ENGLAND.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

GOLF.—White tarlatan, with gathered flounces edged with black doubled tarlatan side pleatings, would be pretty for you. White or black crêpe lisse pleatings are also used for light mournings. Black silk trimmed with white organdy side pleatings and bias folds is another pretty dress.

LOVER OF THE BEAUTIFUL.—The burdock-root tea must be rubbed into the roots only of the hair, which is to be well brushed afterward, and the application ought to be used daily. Three weeks' trial should have the effect to arrest the falling of the hair, but the time differs with cases. If you read carefully what is said about hot baths, you will find that a sponging off with cool water, or a cold plunge, will avert all debility or danger of taking cold afterward. Coarse food is understood to relate to grains and bread, not to beefsteak, though broiled steak is safely included in strict diet. Can not say what will remove the brown spots till you mention whether they are moles, tan, or moth patches. "Black worms" indicate a bad state of the bowels, leading not infrequently to typhoid fever. Strict diet and daily bathing are the only means that will permanently remove them. Large pores are caused by wrong habits of living.

A TROUBLED READER.—Can not recommend the use of hair dyes, as they are unsatisfactory and troublesome to use. Dissolve one tea-spoonful of liquid ammonia in three pints of hot water, and bathe the head three times a day with it, making a fresh wash each time. See "Ugly Girl" papers for advice about the hair.

MARTHA.—Brush your hair back, and keep it in place with cosmetique, procured from any druggist. To acquire flesh, eat plenty of good meat and vegetables, with sugar, chocolate, brown-bread, and milk, exercising daily in the open air.

VERY UGLY GIRL.—Beefsteak, juicy roast meats, grapes, and eggs are useful to strengthen the blood. Druggists in New York do not refuse to sell carbolic acid, though it usually comes dissolved in glycerine, which is readily soluble in other liquids. For your scaly face apply the compound—twenty drops of carbolic acid to a quarter of an ounce of glycerine and three-quarters of an ounce of rose-water. Bathe the face with it three times a day, taking care it does not get in the eyes, and let it dry on. Apply the burdock wash with a bit of flannel, rubbing it into the roots of the hair.

M. C. G.—Make a paste of fine wood ashes and water, letting it dry on the hair you wish to remove, and washing off with weak vinegar.

READERS.—We believe all rules are strictly adhered to at the institution mentioned, but it would certainly be less expense for any one wishing to learn telegraphy to take lessons nearer home. Apply for a position as assistant in some small office, giving services for teaching. It would be cheaper to go to a business college near home than to pay fare to New York and board while there for the sake of free tuition. The expense of a telegraph scholarship in Chicago is about $40. There must be chances to learn telegraphy nearer to you still. Operators prefer assistants that have been trained in an office, and not in a college. There seems to be no reason for the limitation named, but there is probably some good cause for it.

INQUIRER.—From three pints to two quarts is as much water as you need. Would your unassisted reason lead you to call a dry rub with a crash mitten "washing?" The term implies the use of water or some other liquid.

WIDE AWAKE YOUTH'S PAPER.—For judicious editing, select and popular contributors, and sprightly, entertaining reading, THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, of Boston, has no superior among the youth's publications.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR Falling, Loss, and Untimely Gray Hair consult Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N.Y.

DR. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, cures all Scalp Diseases.

DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York, cures unnatural redness of the Nose or Face.

L. SHAW.

Great Sacrifice in Human Hair at L. SHAW'S,

364 Bowery, cor. Fourth Street, and 345 Sixth Avenue, Between 21st & 22d Streets.

On account of the general depression in business,

$30 000

worth of first quality pure French Hair, made up into switches and curls, will be sold at GREATLY REDUCED prices, which puts it within the reach of every body to procure a handsome holiday present at a merely nominal figure, and enables me to keep my factory hands employed during the winter.

Every body in want of a handsome Switch should take advantage of this opportunity and call at L. SHAW'S large Hair Establishment before purchasing elsewhere.

Every article WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

I can offer to the Public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches, $1 and upward; Finest Quality of Hair Switches, solid and dyed.
18 inches long, 4 ounces weight...$4; formerly $5.
22 inches long, 4 ounces weight...$5; formerly $6.
26 inches long, 4 ounces weight...$7; formerly $8.
32 inches long, 4 ounces weight...$9; formerly $10.
Shaw's patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, naturally Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS
502-504 Broadway,

Offer for the Season their entire Stock of

Ladies' Furs,

including a Very Extensive and Elegant Assortment of

Seal-Skin Furs,

in all Styles and Qualities, at greatly

Reduced Prices.

502-504 Broadway.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN SUPPORTER

FOR LADIES And Gentlemen

Has no WHALEBONES or STEEL RIBS; no ELASTIC or RUBBER BANDS; is easily adjusted, and fits the form perfectly. Send for circular. D. C. HALL & CO., No. 44 West Broadway, N. Y., Sole Agents for Smith's Perforated Buckskin Under-garments, and Sibley's Patent Dress Shields.

A. SELIG,

(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),

No. 813 Broadway, New York,

Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.

Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

JOUVEN'S INODOROUS KID-GLOVE CLEANER

RENOVATES SOILED GLOVES QUICKLY & THOROUGHLY WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY.

PRICE 50 CENTS PER BOTTLE.

BEAUTIFY THE SKIN

BY USING

LAIRD'S "Bloom of Youth."

This harmless & delightful toilet preparation will remove all discolorations and blemishes from the skin, leaving it SOFT, CLEAR, SMOOTH, and BEAUTIFUL.

SOLD AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

PARIS NOVELTIES ☞ JUST RECEIVED.

The Elegant "PANSY" Corset, the GRACEFUL Corset, NEW BUSTLES, Embroidered Underwear, Undressed Kid Gloves, Fine Fans, and Gift Goods.

J. C. DEVIN,
Under Sturtevant House, 1192 Broadway.

FRENCH EMBROIDERIES AND STAMPING.—V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N. Y. Lingerie, Ladies' and Babies' Trousseau. Direct importation. Finest stock on hand. Orders filled with care. Specialty of Monograms. MACHINES and Perforated PATTERNS.

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS and a book of forty pages mailed for FIFTY CENTS, by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

SPLENDID
AND UNPARALLELED TRIUMPHS
OF THE
WHEELER AND WILSON
SEWING-MACHINE CO.,

NEW YORK,

OVER 81 COMPETITORS

AT THE

World's Exposition, Vienna, 1873, &c.

1. THE KNIGHT'S CROSS OF THE IMPERIAL AUSTRIAN ORDER OF "FRANCIS JOSEPH," conferred by his Apostolic Majesty the Emperor of Austria upon the Honorable Nathaniel Wheeler, President of the Wheeler & Wilson Sewing-Machine Company, as the founder and builder of Sewing-Machine industry.
2. THE GRAND DIPLOMA OF HONOR, recommended by the International Jury for this Sewing-Machine Company only, for their important contributions to the material and social welfare of mankind.
3. THE GRAND MEDAL FOR PROGRESS, awarded for their No. 6 Sewing-Machine, being for progress made since the Paris Exposition of 1867, at which the only Gold Medal for Sewing-Machines was awarded to the Company. Hence this Vienna award marks progress, not from a low level or inferior medal, but from a Gold Medal, the highest award made at Paris.
4. THE GOLD MEDAL FOR MERIT, for the development of Needle Industry, and excellence and superiority of manufactured samples exhibited.
5. A GRAND MEDAL FOR MERIT, for excellence and superiority of Cabinet-work; the only award of this kind in this section.
6. MEDALS FOR SEVERAL CO-OPERATORS of the Wheeler & Wilson Company for superior ability.
7. THE OFFICIAL REPORT, published by the General Direction of the Vienna Exposition, signalizes the supremacy of the Wheeler & Wilson Company for quantity and quality of manufacture, and position in the Sewing-Machine business.

Further Distinguished Honors.

"BALTIMORE, MD., Oct. 31, 1873.

"The MARYLAND INSTITUTE has awarded WHEELER & WILSON the GOLD MEDAL for their New No. 6 Sewing-Machine. Other Sewing-Machines received nothing."

"SAVANNAH, Nov. 4, 1873.

"At the GEORGIA STATE FAIR a SILVER MEDAL, the highest and only premium for Leather Stitching, was awarded to WHEELER & WILSON for samples done on their New No. 6 Sewing-Machine."

"NEW YORK, Nov. 15, 1873.

"At the Forty-Second Exhibition of 'THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK,' the Highest Premium has been awarded for WHEELER & WILSON'S New No. 6 Sewing-Machine."

FURS AT PANIC PRICES.

BURKE,

210 BROADWAY, cor. Fulton St.

HOLIDAY GOODS
Shaw & Eaton

Are offering THE LATEST NOVELTIES in LACE FICHUS, CAPES, COLLARETTES, SCARFS, TIES, &c., at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

1105 BROADWAY, bet. 24th & 25th Sts., N. Y.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

Marked Down.

UNION ADAMS & CO.

Are offering at Extremely Low Prices

Scotch Wool Hosiery,

Undershirts and Drawers,

Handkerchiefs, Shirts, Collars, and Cuffs, Suspenders,

OUR OWN MAKE,

AND

CARTWRIGHT AND WARNER'S UNDERSHIRTS

AND DRAWERS,

And also have a Fine Variety of

ROBES, JACKETS, RUGS, &c.,

SUITABLE FOR

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

No. 637 Broadway.

PROTECTION
For Crowned Heads.

What more sensible and serviceable present for the holidays than an elegant Umbrella? What Souvenir more likely to recall one to the memory of his friends in the many emergencies of sunshine and storm in this fitful climate? As long as it is kept, it continues a frequent and faithful reminder; and when it goes the swift, mysterious way of all Umbrellas, it becomes, like all departing blessings, doubly dear. It also doubly endears him who gave it, for he may now present another to replace the loss. Make many such gifts, and purchase them at the MANUFACTORY of

ISAAC SMITH'S SON & CO.,
405 BROADWAY.

STERN BROTHERS,
6th Ave. & 23d St.,

TO CLOSE THE SEASON, are offerinn GREAT INDUCEMENTS throughout their entire establishment.

Trimming and Cloaking Velvets, Black Silk Trimming Velvets,
Splendid quality, at $1 50, $1 85, $2 25, $2 50.

Colored Silk Velvets, in all the desirable colors, from $1 00 a yard upward, according to color.

Elegant Satins, in all colors, reduced to $1 a yard.

Rare inducements in

BLACK ALL-SILK CLOAK VELVET.

5 pieces, all-silk, extra quality, 24 in. wide.....$5 25
7 pieces, all-silk, finest quality, 28 in. wide..... 6 75
Guinet & Cie., finest make and finish, at $8 00 & $10 00

Our immense assortment of
DRESS AND CLOAK TRIMMINGS,
REAL GUIPURE AND THREAD LACES,
PLAIN AND BEADED YAK LACES,
POINT and POINT APPLIQUE LACES,
☞ At a further reduction of 12½ per cent.

We direct attention to our attractive stock of

BERLIN WORSTED EMBROIDERIES.

Cushions, Slippers, Rugs, Chair Strips, Brackets, &c., &c., &c., with all necessary materials.

LADIES at a distance, in ordering any thing in this line, by stating article, color, size, &c., can rest assured of having the same promptly attended to at lowest prices.

ESPECIAL ATTENTION PAID TO ORDERS.

STERN BROTHERS,

Sixth Avenue and 23d Street, New York.

LADIES! JUST THE PAPER FOR YOU!!!

Send stamp for Specimen Copy ☞ Free.

The Ladies' Floral Cabinet

And Pictorial Home Companion.

Devoted to Illustrated Home Literature.

☞ A new and beautiful Paper, containing exquisite engravings of Home Life, Society, and Amusements. LADIES will be interested in its design of Household Elegancies, and information on Dress, Housekeeping, &c. YOUNG PEOPLE will find in it useful hints on Self-Improvement, Manners, Society, Stories, &c. FLOWER LOVERS will be especially delighted with its directions on Growing Flowers and Window Gardening. Gives full information about Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. Try it. The prettiest of Family Pictorial Papers.

Price $1 50 per year.....including Three Chromos.
" $1 25 " " ..... " One "
Price 25 cents on trial three months.

☞ CLUB AGENTS WANTED. Premium List Free. Address

LADIES' FLORAL CABINET CO.,
Box 2445. New York City.

DRESS ELEVATOR.

Instantly changing Skirt from Train to Walking, and Walking to Train.

Price 35c. each. Three free by mail for $1.
Free by mail, 40c. each. 1 doz. free by mail for $3, with full directions. Call or send to W. H. JOHNSON, 267 Broadway, N. Y. AGENTS WANTED.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

Hosted by Google

EHRICH'S.

FURS! FURS! FURS! FURS!
Best and Cheapest in the Country.

Our Furs are exclusively of our own manufacture, and have all been made up with special attention to fineness of Fur and excellence of workmanship. Yet our saving of manufacturers' profits has been so large as to explain our startling prices.

We cordially invite ladies to examine our Furs, and will always esteem it a pleasure to show them, whether they are ready to purchase or not.

We allow no misrepresentations. Every article warranted as represented.

TOYS.

Ladies who wish to see the finest assortment of Toys and Holiday Goods in the United States, selected specially for us in Vienna, Saxony, and Paris, should not fail to pay an early visit to our dominion of Santa Claus. Special rates to Superintendents of Sunday-Schools, Asylums, Fairs, &c., &c.

Rosewood Writing-Desks and Work-Boxes, inlaid with pearl and silver, Dressing Cases, Watch-Stands, &c. Berlin Worsted Embroideries, Slipper Patterns, Lambrequins, &c. Real Lace Collars, Barbes, and Handkerchiefs, &c.; and thousands of articles suitable for fine

Holiday Presents.

Extraordinary Inducements in Real Laces, Black Silks, Alpacas, Shawls, Cloaks, Dress Trimmings, &c., &c.

We have just received the first two Prizes at the American Institute Fair for the superior quality of our Ladies' and Infants' Wear and Millinery Goods, and, therefore, feel warranted in calling the attention of Ladies to our superb assortment of

TRIMMED AND UNTRIMMED
HATS, FEATHERS, FLOWERS, RIBBONS,
and FULL TROUSSEAUX for LADIES, MISSES, AND INFANTS.

We make a specialty of Fine French Underwear.

Send for Fall Catalogue to

EHRICH'S,
287 & 289 8th AVE., Near 24th ST., New York.

Holiday Presents.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Have provided for the Holidays, at retail, the largest, cheapest, and most varied collection of SEASONABLE DRY GOODS ever offered in the city.

EVERY DEPARTMENT has been newly replenished.

EACH ARTICLE marked in plain figures, and shown freely without importunity to purchase.

☞ To insure the PROPER AND PROMPT DELIVERY OF PARCELS they respectfully solicit a morning visit.

Broadway, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Are offering

REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS,
THE NEWEST AND LATEST DESIGNS,
Selected in Europe by one of their firm, and not to be found elsewhere, and at fully
ONE-HALF LESS THAN FORMER PRICES.

FANCY BROCHE AND FANCY STRIPE SHAWLS,
Very elegant, similar value.

SEAL-SKIN SACQUES,
Silk-Lined, Wadded, and Quilted, from the extremely LOW PRICE of $35 each and upward.

READY-MADE SUITS,
Elegantly Trimmed, $12 each and upward.

The largest and most elegant stock of VELVET & CLOTH
POLONAISE SACQUES, CLOAKS, &c.,
At Greatly Reduced Prices.

LADIES' PARIS AND NEW YORK MADE HATS,
TRIMMED WITH FEATHERS AND FLOWERS,
$6 50 each and upward.

EMBROIDERIES, LACES,
LACE GOODS, WEDDING TROUSSEAUX,
INFANTS' WARDROBES,
LINEN CAMBRIC HANDKERCHIEFS,
SCARFS, NECK-TIES, &c., &c.,
At unusually attractive prices.

A VISIT OF INSPECTION WILL AMPLY REPAY.

Broadway, Fourth Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

$1 50.—THE NURSERY.

A Monthly Magazine for Youngest Readers. Superbly Illustrated. SEND STAMP FOR A SAMPLE NUMBER. Now is the time to subscribe. JOHN L. SHOREY, 36 Bromfield Street, Boston.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

HOLIDAY GIFTS!

In addition to our large and attractive stock of Dry Goods for the HOLIDAY SEASON,

TOYS.

We have opened a DEPARTMENT Exclusively for the sale of TOYS, Fancy Goods, &c.

The Toys are of European and Domestic Manufacture. The assortment is Large and UNUSUALLY FINE, and has been placed with us to be entirely disposed of before the close of the Holiday Season.

LORD & TAYLOR,

Broadway and 20th St.,
Grand St., cor. Chrystie, N. Y.

A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

CASHMERE BOUQUET | CASHMERE BOUQUET

MADE BY COLGATE & COMPANY, NEW YORK.

A DELICATE SOAP FOR THE TOILET.

KNABE

Grand, Square, & Upright Pianos,
New York House, No. 112 5th Ave.
WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

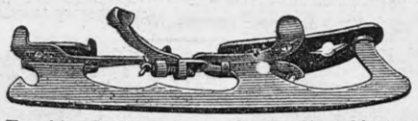
The Best Paper! Try It!!

The Scientific American is the cheapest and best illustrated weekly paper published. Every number contains from 10 to 15 original engravings of new machinery, novel inventions, Bridges, Engineering works, Architecture, improved Farm Implements, and every new discovery in Chemistry. A year's numbers contain 832 pages, and several hundred engravings. Thousands of volumes are preserved for binding and reference. The practical receipts are well worth ten times the subscription price. Terms, $3 a year by mail. Specimens sent free. A new volume commences Jan. 3, 1874. May be had of all News Dealers.

PATENTS obtained on the best terms. Models of new inventions and sketches examined, and advice free. All patents are published in the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN the week they issue. Send for pamphlet, 110 pages, containing laws and full directions for obtaining Patents.

Address for the Paper or concerning Patents,
MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.
Branch Office, cor. F and 7th Sts., Washington, D. C.

THE AMERICAN CLUB SKATE.



For either Ladies or Gents. Can be adjusted instantly. Requires no heel plates, straps, or key. Made of the best welded steel, and every pair warranted. Samples sent C. O. D. Price, No. 1, blued tops, $6 00; No. 2, full polished, $7 00; or nickel-plated, $9 00. We make the following lengths, which must correspond with length of shoe worn: 8—8½—9—9½—10—10½—11—11½ inches.
Address PECK & SNYDER,
Manufacturers, 126 Nassau Street, N. Y.

☞ N. B.—Send stamp for our New Catalogue of all styles of Skates, Boxing Gloves, &c.

One Dollar's Worth of Plants and Seeds

GIVEN AWAY

To every subscriber to the Florist's Friend and Family Visitor, a monthly journal of sixteen pages, edited by Mrs. S. O. Johnson (Daisy Eyebright), and published by Chas. A. Reeser. Yearly subscriptions, $1 25, with privilege of selecting one dollar's worth of Plants and Seeds, at Catalogue rates, as a premium. Floriculture, Horticulture, Home Adornments, Pursuits, and Pleasures will all be discussed in its pages. Specimen copy free. My illustrated Catalogue of Plants and Seeds for 1874, 100 pages, with a packet of choice pansy seed, sent on receipt of ten cents. Address
CHAS. A. REESER, Pleasantville, Pa.

SCHOOLDAY MAGAZINE.

ONLY $1.00 A YEAR

Eighteenth year. The Cheapest and best Young Folks' Magazine published. A fine $2 Engraving FREE to every subscriber. GOOD PAY to Agents. Send a three-cent stamp for Specimen and "tools" to work with. Address the Publishers,
J. W. DAUGHADAY & CO.,
436 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

IF YOU WANT A SUPERIOR GOLD WATCH,
Buy a Ladd Patent Stiffened

GOLD WATCH CASE,

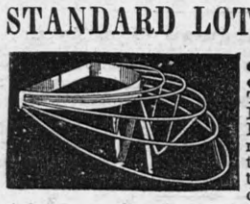
Fitted with a fine movement to suit, and you are all right. You will thus save a handsome sum of money, and your movement will have a Case of unexcelled elegance and durability. ☞ For sale by dealers in watches generally. Send for full descriptive circulars to the Manufacturers,

J. A. BROWN & CO.,
11 Maiden Lane, New York.

LADIES! CONSTITUTION WATER IS GOOD FOR ALL FEMALE COMPLAINTS; gives immediate relief. Dose 40 drops. Send for circular. MORGAN & ALLEN, Agents, 59 John Street. Female Agents wanted in every town.

$20 PER DAY. 1000 Agents wanted. Particulars free. A. H. BLAIR & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE.



Diploma Awarded by the American Institute A. W. Thomas, Patentee and Manufacturer, for the Lightest, Strongest, and most comfortable Bustle that can be worn. Sizes to suit every style of dress. Wholesale Depots:
91 White St., N. Y. 801 Race St., Philadelphia.

200 Pianos AND Organs,

New and Second-hand, of First-class Makers, will be sold at Lower Prices for cash, or on Installments, or for rent, in City or Country, during this Financial Crisis, and the HOLIDAYS, by HORACE WATERS & SON, No. 481 Broadway, than ever before offered in New York. Agents wanted for the sale of Waters' Celebrated Pianos, Concerto and Orchestral Organs. Illustrated Catalogues Mailed. Great Inducements to the Trade. A large discount to Ministers, Churches, Sunday-Schools, &c.

Every baby must have it. IS THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 532 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

THREE PAIR

Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, and Dress-Trimmings. A splendid Black Dress Silk, $1 25 yard. Heavy Black Silk Velvet, only $2 yard—worth double. Samples sent free.

FINE FURS

of every description at less than manufacturers' prices. ☞ Send for Price-List. All goods selected therefrom sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N. Y.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LINNGTON, Chicago.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00: postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

CHRISTMAS & NEW YEAR'S PRESENTS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

BROADWAY, cor. 19th St., N. Y.

INDIA SHAWLS.
REAL POINT SHAWLS,
LACE AND EMBROIDERED HANDKERCHIEFS,
INITIAL HANDKERCHIEFS,
LACE OPERA SCARFS,

GENUINE FURS.
LADIES' & GENTLEMEN'S SEAL CAPS, GLOVES, AND COLLARS,
FUR ROBES,
FUR-LINED CARRIAGE CLOAKS.

UMBRELLAS.
GENTLEMEN'S ROBE DE CHAMBRES.
CARDIGAN, and SMOKING JACKETS.
MEDICATED FLANNEL AND CASHMERE UNDERWEAR.
SILK AND CASHMERE MUFFLERS.
TIES, SCARFS, AND SUSPENDERS.
STUDS AND SLEEVE-BUTTONS.

KID GLOVES.
CASTOR GLOVES.
WOOL-LINED GLOVES.

STRIPED FANCY COLORRD SILKS,
at 75 cents per yard.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH
DRESS GOODS, PRINTS, &C.,
CUT IN DRESS LENGTHS.

The above, for the convenience of CUSTOMERS, will be placed on a SEPARATE COUNTER.

BROADWAY, cor. Nineteenth Street.

AT

MEARES',

SIXTH AVE. & NINETEENTH ST.,
GRAND EXPOSITION AND OPENING OF Christmas Novelties & Holiday Goods,
TOYS, DOLLS, AND FANCY ARTICLES
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

Embroidered Worsted Goods, Russia and Vienna Leather Glove and Handkerchief Boxes, Pocket-Books and Satchels, Willow Work-Stands, and Silk-Lined Work Baskets
EMBROIDERED LINEN SETS, CUFFS, & COLLARS.
LADIES' & GENTS' INITIAL HANDKERCHIEFS.

DRESS GOODS ARRANGED EXPRESSLY FOR HOLIDAY PURCHASERS,
All colors, 20c., 25c., 30c., 38c., 40c., and 50c. yard, and at a great reduction from former rates.
Splendid Black Dress Silk, $1, $1 10, $1 28, and $1 35.
Superior Black Dress Silk, $1 75, $2, and $2 25.
FINE FRENCH FLOWERS & MILLINERY GOODS.
Bonnet and Trimming Velvets.
Real Point and Point Applique Laces,
Real Thread, Guipure, Val., and Yak Laces.
Real Thread and Point Applique Barbes.
Handkerchiefs and Collars.
Gents' Smoking and Cardigan Jackets.
Neck-Ties, Shirts, Gloves, and Mufflers.
Ladies' and Gents' Fine Silk Umbrellas.

All forming a grand assortment so extensive and complete, having made all our purchases with a view to supplying the wants of parties purchasing for the Holidays, that strangers visiting the city, families, &c., can find every article both useful and ornamental in this establishment, obviating the necessity of shopping in different stores.

☞ Store open Evenings to 9½ o'clock till after the Holidays.

RICHARD MEARES,
COR. SIXTH AVE. AND NINETEENTH ST.

HOLIDAY GOODS!

Miller & Grant,
No. 879 Broadway,

In addition to reductions already made, will offer their entire Stock of LACES, EMBROIDERIES, &c., during the Holiday Season, at an additional discount of 10 PER CENT. ON ALL PURCHASES.

THE SABBATH
THE LATEST, THE GREATEST, AND THE BEST TUNE BOOK FOR Church Choirs of all Denominations.
Price, $1.50.
Per dozen Copies, $18 50.
One Sample Copy, by Mail, $1.25.
LEE & WALKER, 922 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

PLEASANT and profitable employment for Women can be had by taking subscriptions for "WHAT WOMAN SHOULD KNOW." A complete book on the physiology, health, and life of women. Has sold tremendously, and, as it is the only work of the kind ever written by a woman, is highly prized. Some lady agents have sold over 500 copies already. Notwithstanding the times, this book will sell largely. Sample sheets and terms sent free, by J. M. STODDART & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

$375 A MONTH to Male or Female Agents. NOVELTY COMPANY, Biddeford, Me.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

A DEVOUT clergyman sought every opportunity to impress upon the mind of his son the fact that God takes care of all His creatures; that the falling sparrow attracts His attention, and that His loving-kindness is over all his works. Happening one day to see a crane wading in quest of food, the good man pointed out to his son the perfect adaptation of the crane to get his living in that manner. "See," said he, "how his legs are formed for wading! What a long slender bill he has! Observe how nicely he folds his feet when putting them in or drawing them out of the water! He does not cause the slightest ripple! He is thus enabled to approach the fish without giving them any notice of his arrival. My son," said he, "it is impossible to look at that bird without recognizing the goodness of God in thus providing the means of subsistence."

"Yes," replied the boy, "I think I see the goodness of God, at least so far as the crane is concerned; but, after all, father, don't you think the arrangement a little rough on the fish?"

A man got up before dawn Sunday morning to see the sun rise, and was shot by the exasperated owner of a melon patch next door. In May last he made a similar effort, and was bitten on the heel by a strange dog. He thinks of hiring a boy to do the early rising for his family.

A California man of letters has taken to farming, and posted the following notice in his field: "Confoozilation to any man or woman's cows or oxen if they gits in these air oats, sai eye; his or her tail will be cut off, as the case may be. A man eye um, and pay mi taxes, but confoozilation to a man who lets his critters run loose, sai eye."

In the earliest days of the human race, when population was more sparse than it has ever been since, and introductions were also scarce, with little or none of form or ceremony attending them—"no cards"—our first parents, after their first surprise, had to introduce themselves to one another, though the following dialogue is not found on record:

ADAM. "Madam, I'm Adam."
EVE. "Adam, I'm madam." [They embrace.

A veteran officer observes, "I never place reliance on a man who is telling what he would have done had he been there. I have noticed that somehow this kind of people never do get there."

Sentimental young men insist that it is impossible to talk love to the suburban belle beneath the trees and in the moonlight, owing to the interposition of the caterpillars, that even crawl between clasped hands and beating hearts.

"There are people," said a gentleman to a friend, "who never see an afflicted person but they pray to Heaven to be delivered from a similar infirmity. Now I never see a blind man without praying to be deaf."

"Why?"

"Because I am conscious that he is going to play a clarionet or a hand-organ to me."

"John," said a gentleman to the beadle of a country parish, "ye hae been sae long about the minister's hand that I dare say ye could preach a sermon yoursel' now."

"Ah, no, Sir," replied John; "I couldna preach a sermon, but maybe I could draw an inference."

"Weel, John," said the querist, humoring the quiet vanity of the beadle, "what inference could ye draw frae this text, 'A wild ass snuffeth up the wind at her pleasure?'"

"Weel, Sir, I wad draw this inference—he wad snuff a lang time before he wad fatten upon't."

WHAT A DREADFUL STORY—AND DIDN'T HE CATCH IT NEXT MORNING!

WIFE OF HIS BOSOM. "Why, Charles, aren't you ashamed to come Home in such a disgraceful State? Where on Earth have you been?"
LORD OF CREATION. "Been, m'Dear—hic—been hear Lecshur Young Men's Christian Shoshiashun."

The omission of a comma has frequently given a very awkward turn to a sentence. We remember an epitaph which suffered severely from such an oversight. It ran pretty much as follows:

"Erected to the memory of John Phillips, accidentally shot as a mark of affection by his brother."

A young gentleman at Kansas City sent seventy-five cents to New York recently for a method of writing without pen or ink. He received the following inscription, in large type, on a card—"Write with a pencil."

It was a very ungrateful person who sent, by carrier-pigeon, the following message to his place in the country: "Send basket of early green pease by express train; pack the bearer of this in with them, as he is a plump bird, and I intend to eat him with them."

Some melancholy-minded burglars recently entered an undertaker's shop and stole a coffin. The proprietor announces that if any of them will come again he will furnish them with a corpse to put in it.

An enthusiastic African, who had "spent de winter in Jamaky," found it an earthly Paradise. He said he could "lie abed, and, putting his arms out de windy, pick oranges, pine-apples, and Jamaky rum right off de trees."

In Nevada a contemplative Digger Indian sat watching a party of base-ball players, who seemed to him to be working very hard. Turning to one of them, he asked, "How much you get one day?"

"How old is your mamma?" asked a love-smitten old bachelor of the daughter of the widow who had enchanted him.

"I don't know, Sir; ma's age varies from forty-three to twenty-five," was the artless reply, and the bachelor was disenchanted.

A doctor out West wants the custom of tolling bells for funerals discontinued. It has a depressing effect upon the sick, and can not prove a source of much enjoyment to the departed.

"Well, neighbor, what is the most Christian news this morning?" said a gentleman to a friend.

"I have just bought a barrel of flour for a poor woman."

"Just like you! Who is it you have made happy by your charity this time?"

"My wife!"

An exhorter recommended the Christian religion to the ungodly, because he had "been a church-member fifteen years, and it hadn't cost him but 18¾ cents."

Why is a beefsteak like a locomotive?—It's not of much account without it's tender.

An Irishman has defined nothing to be a footless stocking without legs. A description by another Emeraldier is better. "What is nothing?" he was asked. "Shut your eyes and you will see it," said Pat.

The custodian of what had been Garibaldi's straw-stuffed bed in Ischia was heard to mutter, on seeing a lady carrying away a few straws as a relic, "They will do it! I've stuffed it six times already since the general left."

A bachelor friend compares a shirt button to life, because it so often hangs by a thread.

In a late severe gale a lady asked a neighbor if he was not afraid his house would blow away. "Oh no," was the answer, "the mortgage on it is so heavy as to make that impossible."

An iron will, a silvery voice, plenty of brass, and a modicum of tin win golden opinions.

A Boston dry-goods dealer advertises "financial crash towels."

It is on record that Adam, the first man to receive a land grant, died poor and miserable.

How did Robinson Crusoe know that he was on an inhabited island?—Because he saw a great swell pitching into a little cove.

A young man who belongs to a club where euchre is the principal intellectual study took a young lady to church the other Sunday evening, and fell into a gentle doze before the minister had reached his "thirdly." He can not explain exactly how it happened, but just as the reverend gentleman said something about the "last trump," the young man earnestly ejaculated, "I'll go alone!" The young lady says the next time he can "go alone," for she won't go with him. And she let him go home alone, too!

Dr. ——, entering the hospital surgery, met Paddy Boyle, the orderly, and asked him which he considered the most dangerous of the many cases then in hospital. "That, Sir," said Paddy, as with an indicative jerk of the thumb he pointed to where on the table lay a case of surgical instruments.

An Irish juror having applied to the judge to be excused from serving on account of deafness, the judge said, "Could you hear my charge to the jury, Sir?"

"Yes, I heard your honor's charge," said Paddy, "but I couldn't make sense out of it."

Pat was let off.

Brigham Young preached a sermon lately, in which he said that the sisters thought they had a good deal to bear, but if they could stand in the shoes of their husbands they would know what trials and perplexities are. "Just fancy a man," said the prophet, "with two, or three, or half a dozen beloved wives catching him on one side, and, before he can take half a dozen steps, more wives catching him on the other, and 'I want this,' 'I want that,' 'This is not right,' and so on; their mind just pulled to pieces."

A successful joke was the other day played upon an enthusiastic band of archæologists who explored the quaint old town of Banbury in search of antique lore. The following was sent to the secretary as an inscription copied from the corner-stone of an old fabric that had been recently pulled down:

"SEOGEH SREVE EREH WOISUME VAHL
LAH SEHS SE OTREH NOS LLEBDNAS
REGNI FREH NOS GNIRES ROHYAR
GANOED IRYD ALE NIFAE ESOTS SORCY
RUB NABOT ES ROHK CO CAED IR."

After the learned heads of the savants had been puzzled for a while, one of their number hit upon the expedient of reading the learned inscription backward, when it was found to be an ingenious transposition of a well-known nursery rhyme, "Ride a cock-horse," etc.

Boys who disturb camp-meeting by crying "Amen" in the wrong place, and remarking "Glory" with more zeal than judgment, should read and ponder the fate of thirteen small boys in Kansas. These thirteen ill-advised boys were guilty, so the story goes, of disturbing a Kansas camp-meeting by insisting upon shouting "Amen" when a very muscular preacher, who prided himself on his voice, was singing a hymn. The preacher bore it for some time, but finally becoming filled with righteous wrath, he descended from the pulpit, and, never once interrupting his hymn, successively reversed and spanked the thirteen small boys. As his avenging hand descended, and the dust of the small boys filled the air, the rest of the congregation shouted in rapture, and encouraged him with loud cries of "Go on, brother, go on!" Then he returned to the pulpit, still singing, and those boys went half a mile away behind a hay-stack, and lay down with their faces to the ground and wept bitterly.

When you see a little girl with odd gaiters on her feet, a crownless jockey on her head, three brown paper packages in her arms, and a mouthful of candy, you may know her mother is washing.

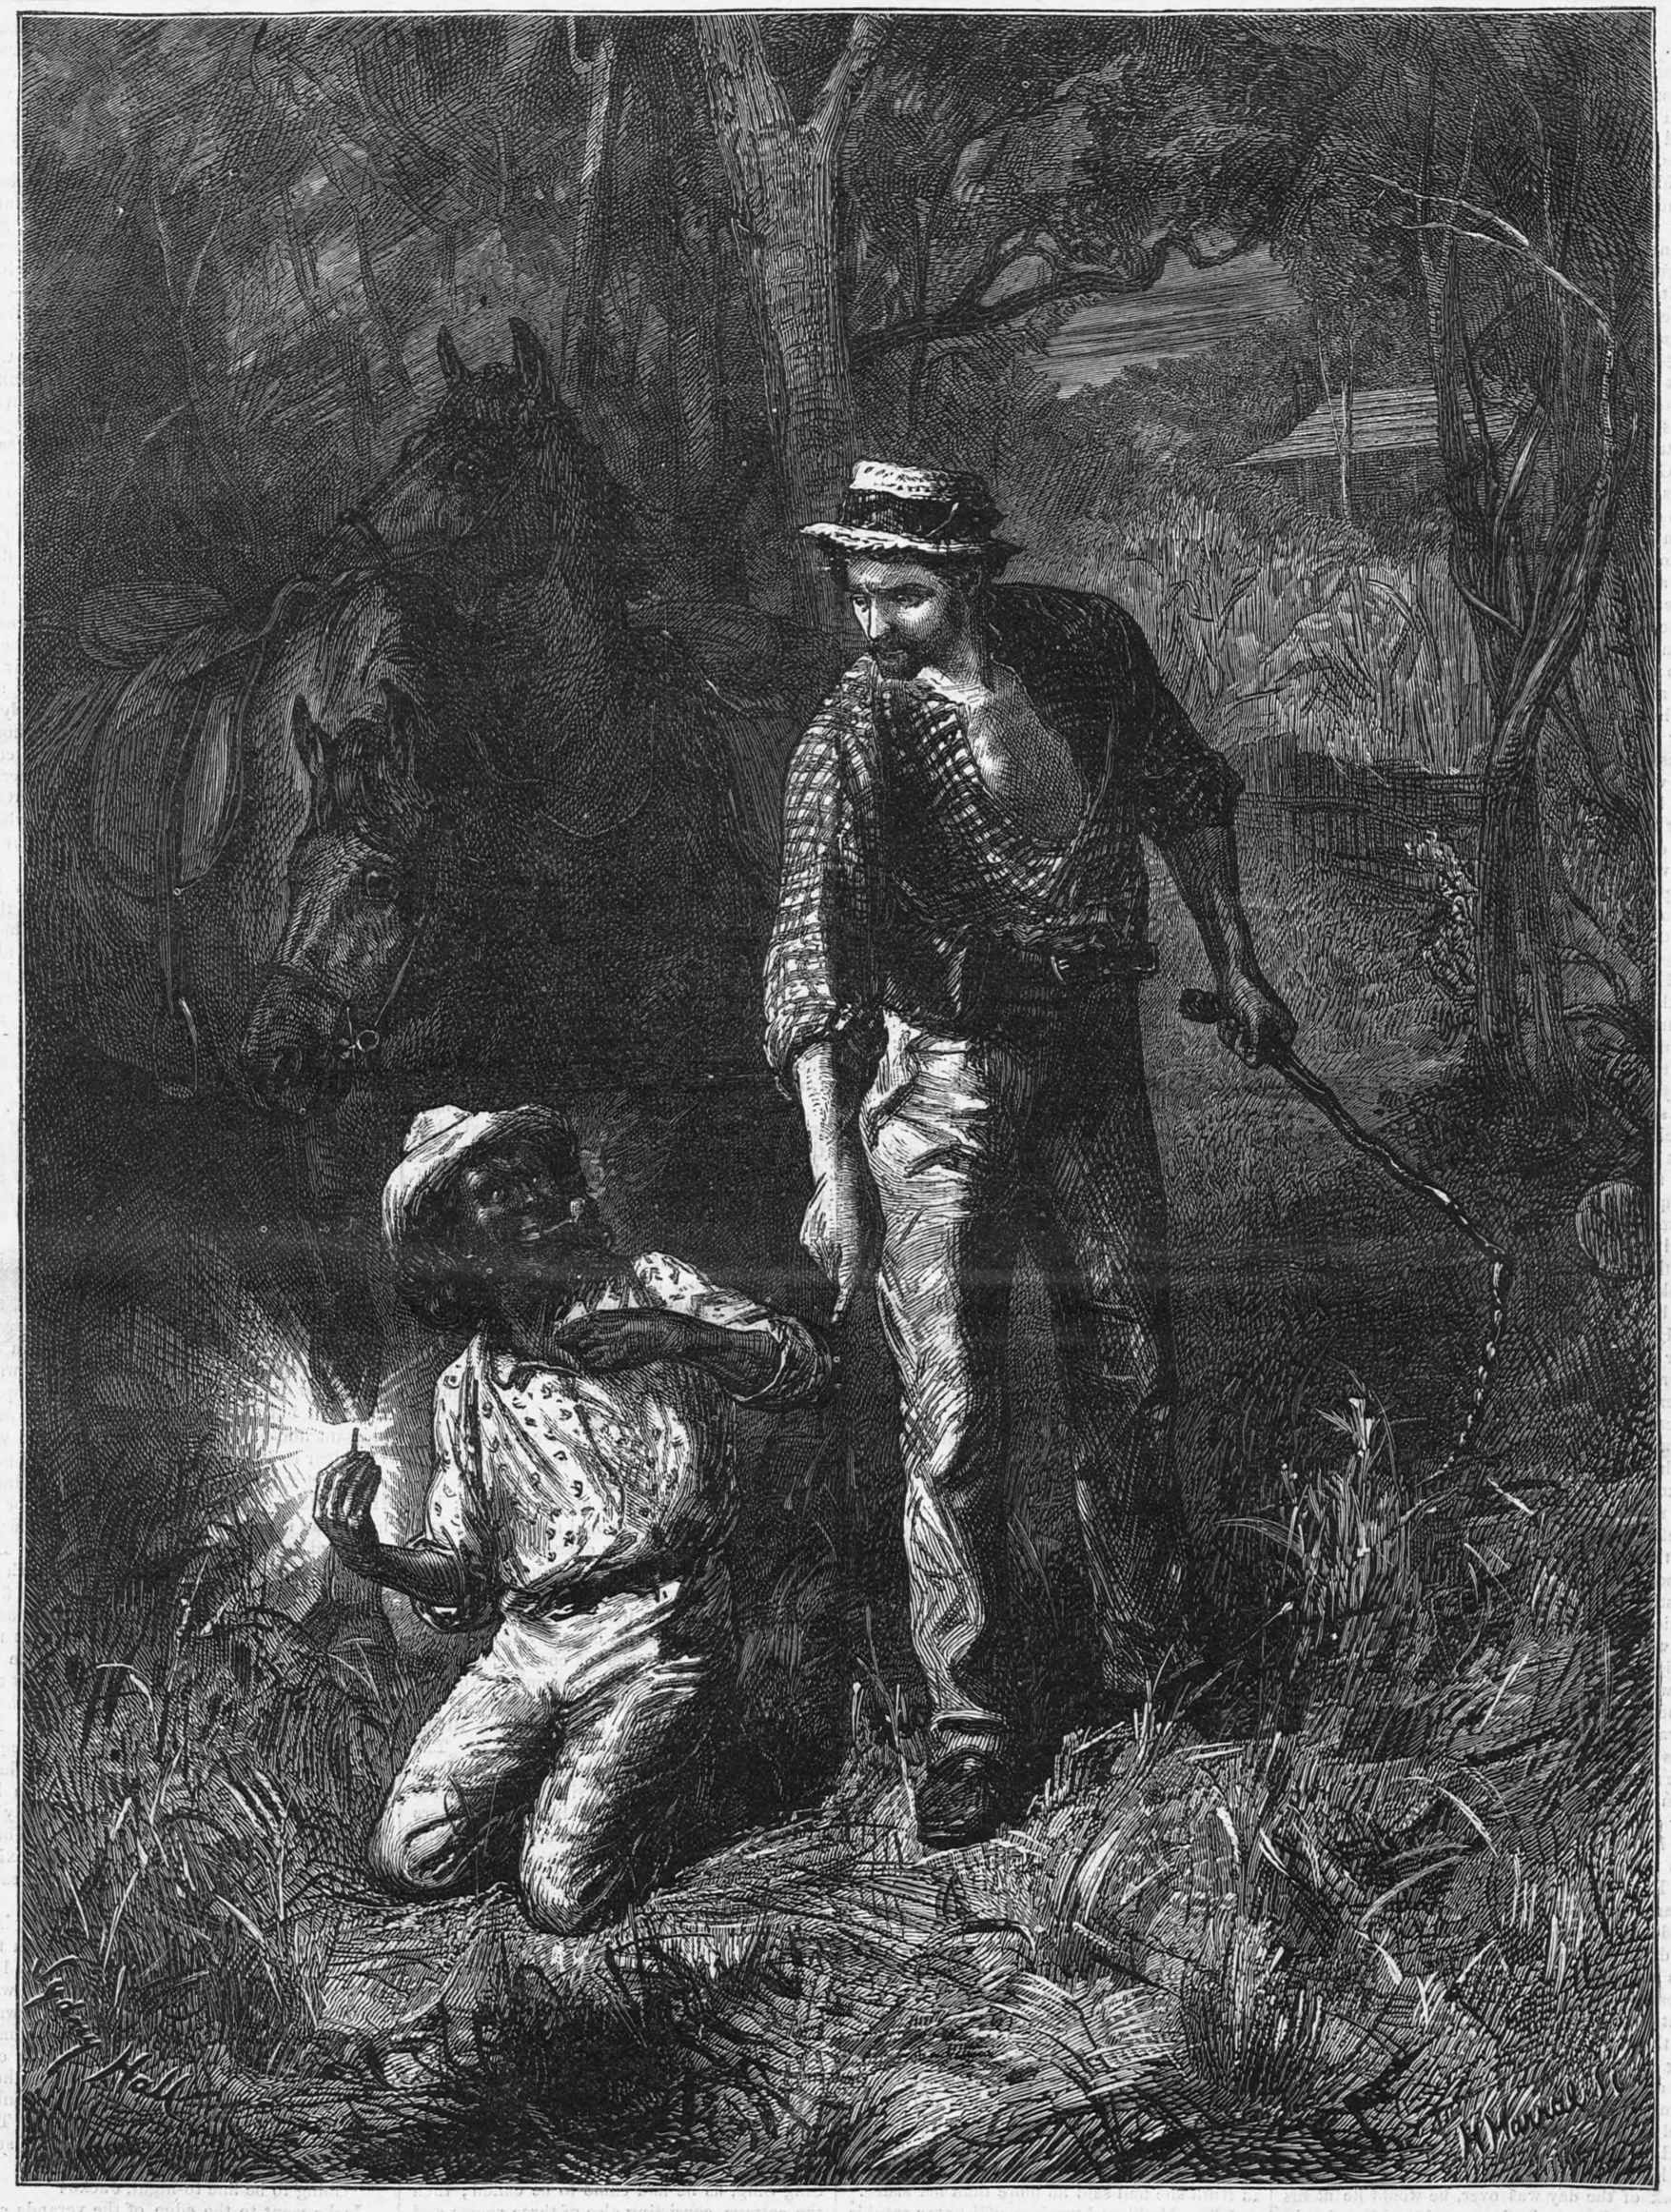
STREET NUISANCES. No. 1.

DEDICATED TO LAZY STORE-KEEPERS WHO SWEEP OUT CLOUDS OF DUST AND DIRT IN THE MORNING UPON THE PEOPLE PASSING.

STREET NUISANCES. No. 2.—IN A CITY RAILROAD CAR.

ONE OF THOSE CELTIC LADIES LOADED WITH PROVISIONS, HAMS, ETC., TRYING TO HOLD ON WITHOUT DISTURBING THE PASSENGERS IN THE CAR—WITH ABOUT THE USUAL SUCCESS.

Hosted by Google



HARRY HEATHCOTE OF GANGOIL.

"Jacko had his pipe still alight when Heathcote returned. 'You young monkey,' said he, 'have you been using matches?' 'Why not, Mr. Harry? Don't the grass burn ready, Mr. Harry? My word!' Then Jacko stooped down, lit another match, and showed Heathcote the burned patch."—CHAPTER II.

HARRY HEATHCOTE OF GANGOIL.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

CHAPTER I.

GANGOIL.

JUST a fortnight before Christmas, 1871, a young man, twenty-four years of age, returned home to his dinner about eight o'clock in the evening. He was married, and with him and his wife lived his wife's sister. At that somewhat late hour he walked in among the two young women, and another much older woman who was preparing the table for dinner. The wife and the wife's sister each had a child in her lap, the elder having seen some fifteen months of its existence, and the younger three months. "He has been out since seven, and I don't think he's had a mouthful," the wife had just said. "Oh, Harry, you must be half starved," she exclaimed, jumping up to greet him, and throwing her arm round his bare neck.

"I'm about whole melted," he said, as he kissed her. "In the name of charity give me a nobbler. I did get a bit of damper and a pannikin of tea up at the German's hut; but I never was so hot or so thirsty in my life. We're going to have it in earnest this time. Old Bates says that when the gum leaves crackle, as they do now, before Christmas, there won't be a blade of grass by the end of February."

"I hate Old Bates," said the wife. "He always prophesies evil, and complains about his rations."

"He knows more about sheep than any man this side of the Mary," said her husband. From all this I trust the reader will understand that the Christmas to which he is introduced is not the Christmas with which he is intimate on this side of the equator—a Christmas of blazing fires in-doors, and of sleet and snow and frost outside—but the Christmas of Australia, in which happy land the Christmas fires are apt to be lighted—or to light themselves—when they are by no means needed.

Hosted by Google

The young man who had just returned home had on a flannel shirt, a pair of mole-skin trowsers, and an old straw hat, battered nearly out of all shape. He had no coat, no waistcoat, no braces, and nothing round his neck. Round his waist there was a strap or belt, from the front of which hung a small pouch, and, behind, a knife in a case. And stuck into a loop in the belt, made for the purpose, there was a small brier-wood pipe. As he dashed his hat off, wiped his brow, and threw himself into a rocking-chair, he certainly was rough to look at, but by all who understood Australian life he would have been taken to be a gentleman. He was a young squatter, well known west of the Mary River, in Queensland. Harry Heathcote of Gangoil, who owned 30,000 sheep of his own, was a magistrate in those parts, and able to hold his own among his neighbors, whether rough or gentle; and some neighbors he had, very rough, who made it almost necessary that a man should be able to be rough also, on occasions, if he desired to live among them without injury. Heathcote of Gangoil could do all that. Men said of him that he was too imperious, too masterful, too much inclined to think that all things should be made to go as he would have them. Young as he was, he had been altogether his own master since he was of age—and not only his own master, but the master also of all with whom he was brought into contact from day to day. In his life he conversed but seldom with any but those who were dependent on him, nor had he done so for the last three years. At an age at which young men at home are still subject to pastors and masters, he had sprung at once into patriarchal power, and, being a man determined to thrive, had become laborious and thoughtful beyond his years.

Harry Heathcote had been left an orphan, with a small fortune in money, when he was fourteen. For two years after that he had consented to remain quietly at school, but at sixteen he declared his purpose of emigrating. Boys less than himself in stature got above him at school, and he had not liked it. For a twelvemonth he was opposed by his guardian; but at the end of the year he was fitted forth for the colony. The guardian was not sorry to be quit of him, but prophesied that he would be home again before a year was over. The lad had not returned, and it was now a settled conviction among all who knew him that he would make or mar his fortune in the new land that he had chosen.

He was a tall, well-made young fellow, with fair hair and a good-humored smile, but ever carrying in his countenance marks of what his enemies called pig-headedness, his acquaintances obstinacy, and those who loved him firmness. His acquaintances were, perhaps, right, for he certainly was obstinate. He would take no man's advice, he would submit himself to no man, and in the conduct of his own business preferred to trust to his own insight rather than to the experience of others. It would sometimes occur that he had to pay heavily for his obstinacy. But, on the other hand, the lessons which he learned he learned thoroughly. And he was kept right in his trade by his own indefatigable industry. That trade was the growth of wool. He was a breeder of sheep on a Queensland sheep-run, and his flocks ran far afield over a vast territory of which he was the only lord. His house was near the river Mary, and beyond the river his domain did not extend; but around him on his own side of the river he could ride for ten miles in each direction without getting off his own pastures. He was master, as far as his mastership went, of 120,000 acres—almost an English county—and it was the pride of his heart to put his foot off his own territory as seldom as possible. He sent his wool annually down to Brisbane, and received his stores, tea and sugar, flour and brandy, boots, clothes, tobacco, etc., once or twice a year from thence. But the traffic did not require his own presence at the city. So self-contained was the working of the establishment that he was never called away by his business, unless he went to see some lot of highly bred sheep which he might feel disposed to buy; and as for pleasure, it had come to be altogether beyond the purpose of his life to go in quest of that. When the work of the day was over, he would lie at his length upon rugs in the veranda, with a pipe in his mouth, while his wife sat over him reading a play of Shakspeare or the last novel that had come to them from England.

He had married a fair girl, the orphan daughter of a bankrupt squatter whom he had met in Sydney, and had brought her and her sister into the Queensland bush with him. His wife idolized him. His sister-in-law, Kate Daly, loved him dearly—as she had cause to do, for he had proved himself to be a very brother to her; but she feared him also somewhat. The people about the Mary said that she was fairer and sweeter to look at even than the elder sister. Mrs. Heathcote was the taller of the two, and the larger-featured. She certainly was the higher in intellect, and the fittest to be the mistress of such an establishment as that at Gangoil.

When he had washed his hands and face, and had swallowed the very copious but weak allowance of brandy-and-water which his wife mixed for him, he took the eldest boy on his lap and fondled him. "By George!" he said, "old fellow, you sha'n't be a squatter."

"Why not, Harry?" asked his wife.

"Because I don't want him to break his heart every day of his life."

"Are you always breaking yours? I thought your heart was pretty well hardened now."

"When a man talks of his heart, you and Kate are thinking of loves and doves, of course."

"I wasn't thinking of loves and doves, Harry," said Kate. "I was thinking how very hot it must have been to-day. We could only bear it in the veranda by keeping the floor always wet. I don't wonder that you were troubled."

"That comes from heaven or Providence, or from something that one knows to be unassailable, and therefore one can put up with it. Even if one gets a sun-stroke one does not complain. The sun has a right to be there, and is no interloper, like a free-selector. I can't understand why free-selectors and mosquitoes should have been introduced into the arrangements of the world."

"I s'pose the poor must live somewheres, and 'squiters too," said Mrs. Growler, the old maid-servant, as she put a boiled leg of mutton on the table. "Now, Mr. Harry, if you're hungered, there's something for you to eat in spite of the free-selectors."

"Mrs. Growler," said the master, "excuse me for saying that you jump to conclusions."

"My jumping is pretty well-nigh done," said the old woman.

"By no means. I find that old people can jump quite as briskly as young. You have rebuked me under the impression that I was grudging something to the poor. Let me explain to you that a free-selector may be, and very often is, a rich man. He whom I had in my mind is not a poor man, though I won't swear but what he will be before a year is over."

"I know who you mean, Mr. Harry; you mean the Medlicots. A very nice gentleman is Mr. Medlicot, and a very nice old lady is Mrs. Medlicot. And a deal of good they're going to do, by all accounts."

"Now, Mrs. Growler, that will do," said the wife.

The dinner consisted of a boiled leg of mutton, a large piece of roast beef, potatoes, onions, and an immense pot of tea. No glasses were even put upon the table. The two ladies had dressed for dinner, and were bright and pretty as they would have been in a country house at home; but Harry Heathcote had sat down just as he had entered the room.

"I know you are tired to death," said his wife, "when I see you eat your dinner like that."

"It isn't being tired, Mary; I'm not particularly tired. But I must be off again in about an hour."

"Out again to-night?"

"Yes, indeed."

"On horseback?"

"How else? Old Bates and Mickey are in their saddles still. I don't want to have my fences burned as soon as they're put up. It's a ticklish thing to think that a spark of fire any where about the place might ruin me, and to know at the same time that every man about the run and every swagsman that passes along have matches in their pockets. There isn't a pipe lighted on Gangoil this time of the year that mightn't make a beggar of you and me. That's another reason why I wouldn't have the young un a squatter."

"I declare I think that squatters have more trouble than any people in the world," said Kate Daly.

"Free-selectors have their own troubles too, Kate," said he.

It must be explained as we go on that Heathcote felt that he had received a great and peculiar grievance from the hands of one Medlicot, a stranger who had lately settled near him, and that this last remark referred to a somewhat favorable opinion which had been expressed about this stranger by the two ladies. It was a little unfair, as having been addressed specially to Kate, intending as it did to imply that Kate had better consider the matter well before she allowed her opinion of the stranger to become dangerously favorable; for in truth she had said no more than her sister.

"The Medlicots' troubles will never trouble me, Harry," she said.

"I hope not, Kate; nor mine either more than we can help."

"But they do," said Mary. "They trouble me, and her too, very much."

"A man's back should be broad enough to bear all that for himself," said Harry. "I get ashamed of myself when I grumble, and yet one seems to be surly if one doesn't say what one's thinking."

"I hope you'll always tell me what you're thinking, dear."

"Well, I suppose I shall—till this fellow is old enough to be talked to, and to be made to bear the burden of his father's care."

"By that time, Harry, you will have got rich, and we shall all be in England, sha'n't we?"

"I don't know about being rich, but we shall have been free-selected off Gangoil.—Now, Mrs. Growler, we've done dinner, and I'll have a pipe before I make another start. Is Jacko in the kitchen? Send him through to me on to the veranda."

Gangoil was decidedly in the bush—according to common Australian parlance, all sheep stations are in the bush, even though there should not be a tree or shrub within sight. They who live away from the towns live a "bush life." Small towns, as they grow up, are called bush towns, as we talk of country towns. The "bush," indeed, is the country generally. But the Heathcotes lived absolutely and actually in the bush. There are Australian pastures which consist of plains on which not a tree is to be seen for miles; but others are forests, so far extending that their limits are almost unknown. Gangoil was surrounded by forest, in some places so close as to be impervious to men and almost to animals, in which the undergrowth was thick and tortuous and almost platted, through which no path could be made without an axe, but of which the greater portions were open, without any under-wood, between which the sheep could wander at their will, and men could ride, with a sparse surface of coarse grass, which after rain would be luxuriant, but in hot weather would be scorched down to the ground. At such times—and those times were by far the more common—a stranger would wonder where the sheep would find their feed. Immediately round the house, or station, as it was called, about one hundred acres had been cleared, or nearly cleared, with a few trees left here and there for ornament or shade. Further afield, but still round the home quarters, the trees had been destroyed, the run of the sap having been stopped by "ringing" the bark; but they still stood like troops of skeletons, and would stand, very ugly to look at, till they fell, in the course of nature, by reason of their own rottenness. There was a man always at work about the place—Boscobel he was called—whose sole business was to destroy the timber after this fashion, so that the air might get through to the grasses, and that the soil might be relieved from the burden of nurturing the forest trees.

For miles around the domain was divided into paddocks, as they were there called; but these were so large that a stranger might wander in one of them for a day and never discover that he was inclosed. There were five or six paddocks on the Gangoil run, each of which comprised over ten thousand acres, and as all the land was undulating, and as the timber was around you every where, one paddock was exactly like another. The scenery in itself was fine, for the trees were often large, and here and there rocky knolls would crop up, and there were broken crevices in the ground; but it was all alike. A stranger would wonder that any one straying from the house should find his way back to it. There were sundry bush houses here and there, and the so-called road to the coast from the wide pastoral districts further west passed across the run; but these roads and tracks would travel hither and thither, new tracks being opened from time to time by the heavy wool drays and store wagons, as in wet weather the ruts on the old tracks would become insurmountable.

The station itself was certainly very pretty. It consisted of a cluster of cottages, each of which possessed a ground-floor only. No such luxury as stairs was known at Gangoil. It stood about half a mile from the Mary River, on the edge of a creek which ran into it. The principal edifice, that in which the Heathcotes lived, contained only one sitting-room, and a bedroom on each side of it; but in truth there was another room, very spacious, in which the family really passed their time; and this was the veranda which ran along the front and two ends of the house. It was twelve feet broad, and, of course, of great length. Here was clustered the rocking-chairs, and sofas, and work-tables, and very often the cradle of the family. Here stood Mrs. Heathcote's sewing-machine, and here the master would sprawl at his length, while his wife, or his wife's sister, read to him. It was here, in fact, that they lived, having a parlor simply for their meals. Behind the main edifice there stood, each apart, various buildings, forming an irregular quadrangle. The kitchen came first, with a small adjacent chamber in which slept the Chinese man-cook, Sing Sing, as he had come to be called; then the cottage, consisting also of three rooms and a small veranda, in which lived Harry's superintendent, commonly known as Old Bates, a man who had been a squatter once himself, and having lost his all in bad times, now worked for a small salary. In the cottage two of the rooms were devoted to hospitality when, as was not unusual, guests, known or unknown, came that way; and here Harry himself would sleep, if the entertainment of other ladies crowded the best apartments. Then at the back of the quadrangle was the store, perhaps of all the buildings the most important. In here was kept a kind of shop, which was supposed, according to an obsolete rule, to be open for custom for half a day twice a week. The exigencies of the station did not allow of this regularity; but after some fashion the shop was maintained. Tea was to be bought there, and sugar, tobacco, and pickles, jam, nails, boots, hats, flannel shirts, and mole-skin trowsers. Any body who came might buy, but the intention was to provide the station hands, who would otherwise have had to go or send thirty miles for the supply of their wants. Very little money was taken here, generally none. But the quantity of pickles, jam, and tobacco sold was great. The men would consume large quantities of these bush delicacies, and the cost would be deducted from their wages. The tea and sugar, and flour also, were given out weekly, as rations—so much a week—and meat was supplied to them after the same fashion. For it was the duty of this young autocratic patriarch to find provisions for all who were employed around him. For such luxuries as jam and tobacco the men paid themselves.

On the fourth side of the quadrangle was a rough coach-house, and rougher stables. The carriage part of the establishment consisted of two "buggies"—so called always in the bush—open carriages on four wheels, one of which was intended to hold two and the other four sitters. A Londoner looking at them would have declared them to be hopeless ruins; but Harry Heathcote still made wonderful journeys in them, taking care generally that the wheels were sound, and using ropes for the repair of dilapidations. The stables were almost unnecessary, as the horses, of which the supply at Gangoil was very large, roamed in the horse paddock, a comparatively small inclosure containing not above three or four hundred acres, and were driven up as they were wanted. One horse was always kept close at home with which to catch the others; but this horse, for handiness, was generally hitched to a post outside the kitchen door. Harry was proud of his horses, and was sometimes heard to say that few men in England had a lot of thirty at hand as he had, out of which so many would be able to carry a man eighty miles in eight hours at a moment's notice. But his stable arrangements would not have commanded respect in the "Shires." The animals were never groomed, never fed, and most of them never shod. They lived upon grass, and, as he always said, "cut their own bread-and-butter" for themselves.

Gangoil was certainly very pretty. The veranda was covered in with striped blinds, so that when the sun shone hot, or when the rains fell heavily, or when the mosquitoes were more than usually troublesome, there might be something of the protection of an inclosed room. Up all the posts there were flowering creepers, which covered the front with greenery even when the flowers were wanting. From the front of the house down to the creek there was a pleasant falling garden—heart-breaking, indeed, in regard to vegetables, for the opossums always came first, and they who followed the opossums got but little. But the garden gave a pleasant home-like look to the place, and was very dear to Harry, who was, perhaps, indifferent in regard to pease and tomatoes. Harry Heathcote was very proud of the place, for he had made it all himself, having pulled down a wretched barrack that he had found there. But he was far prouder of his wool-shed, which he had also built, and which he regarded as first and foremost among wool-sheds in those parts. By-and-by we shall be called on to visit the wool-shed. Though Heathcote had done all this for Gangoil, it must be understood that the vast extent of territory over which his sheep ran was by no means his own property. He was simply the tenant of the Crown, paying a rent computed at so much a sheep. He had, indeed, purchased the ground on which his house stood, but this he had done simply to guard himself against other purchasers. These other purchasers were the bane of his existence, the one great sorrow which, as he said, broke his heart.

While he was speaking, a rough-looking lad, about sixteen years of age, came through the parlor to the veranda, dressed very much like his master, but unwashed, uncombed, and with that wild look which falls upon those who wander about the Australian plains, living a nomad life. This was Jacko—so called, and no one knew him by any other name—a lad whom Heathcote had picked up about six months since, and who had become a favorite. "The old woman says as you was wanting me?" suggested Jacko.

"Going to be fine to-night, Jacko?"

Jacko went to the edge of the veranda and looked up to the sky. "My word! little squall a-coming," he said.

"I wish it would come from ten thousand buckets," said the master.

"No buckets at all," said Jacko. "Want the horses, master?"

"Of course I want the horses, and I want you to come with me. There are two horses saddled there; I'll ride Hamlet."

CHAPTER II.

A NIGHT'S RIDE.

HARRY jumped from the ground, kissed his wife, called her "old girl," and told her to be happy, and got on his horse at the garden gate. Both the ladies came off the veranda to see him start. "It's as dark as pitch," said Kate Daly.

Digitized by Google

"That's because you have just come out of the light."

"But it is dark—quite dark. You won't be late, will you?" said the wife.

"I can't be very early, as it's near ten now. I shall be back about twelve." So saying, he broke at once into a gallop, and vanished into the night, his young groom scampering after him.

"Why should he go out now?" Kate said to her sister.

"He is afraid of fire."

"But he can't prevent the fires by riding about in the dark. I suppose the fires come from the heat."

"He thinks they come from enemies, and he has heard something. One wretched man may do so much when every thing is dried to tinder. I do so wish it would rain."

The night, in truth, was very dark. It was now midsummer, at which time with us the days are so long that the coming of the one almost catches the departure of its predecessor. But Gangoil was not far outside the tropics, and there were no long summer nights. The heat was intense; but there was a low soughing wind which seemed to moan among the trees without moving them. As they crossed the little home inclosure and the horse paddock, the track was just visible, the trees being dead and the spaces open. About half a mile from the house, while they were still in the horse paddock, Harry turned from the track, and Jacko, of course, turned with him. "You can sit your horse jumping, Jacko?" he asked.

"My word! jump like glory," answered Jacko. He was soon tried. Harry rode at the bush fence—which was not, indeed, much of a fence, made of logs lengthways and crossways, about three feet and a half high—and went over it. Jacko followed him, rushing his horse at the leap, losing his seat and almost falling over the animal's shoulders as he came to the ground. "My word!" said Jacko, just saving himself by a scramble; "who ever saw the like of that?"

"Why don't you sit in your saddle, you stupid young duffer?"

"Sit in my saddle! Why don't he jump proper? Well, you go on. I don't know that I'm a duffer. Duffer, indeed! My word!" Heathcote had turned to the left, leaving the track, which was, indeed, the main road toward the nearest town and the coast, and was now pushing on through the forest with no pathway at all to guide him. To ordinary eyes the attempt to steer any course would have been hopeless. But an Australian squatter, if he have any well-grounded claim to the character of a bushman, has eyes which are not ordinary, and he has, probably, nurtured within himself, unconsciously, topographical instincts which are unintelligible to the inhabitants of cities. Harry, too, was near his own home, and went forward through the thick gloom without a doubt, Jacko following him faithfully. In about half an hour they came to another fence, but now it was too absolutely dark for jumping. Harry had not seen it till he was close to it, and then he pulled up his horse. "My word! why don't you jump away, Mr. Harry? Who's a duffer now?"

"Hold your tongue, or I'll put my whip across your back. Get down and help me pull a log away. The horses couldn't see where to put their feet." Jacko did as he was bid, and worked hard, but still grumbled at having been called a duffer. The animals were quickly led over, the logs were replaced, and the two were again galloping through the forest.

"I thought you were making for the wool-shed," said Jacko.

"We're eight miles beyond the wool-shed," said Harry. They had now crossed another paddock, and had come to the extreme fence on the run. The Gangoil pastures extended much further, but in that direction had not as yet been inclosed. Here they both got off their horses and walked along the fence till they came to an opening, with a slip panel, or movable bars, which had been Heathcote's intended destination. "Hold the horses, Jacko, till I come back," he said.

Jacko, when alone, nothing daunted by the darkness or solitude, seated himself on the top rail, took out a pipe, and struck a match. When the tobacco was ignited he dropped the match on the dry grass at his feet, and a little flame instantly sprung up. The boy waited a few seconds till the flames began to run, and then putting his feet together on the ground stamped out the incipient fire. "My word!" said Jacko to himself, "it's easy done, anyway."

Harry went on to the left for about half a mile, and then stood leaning against the fence. It was very dark, but he was now looking over into an inclosure which had been altogether cleared of trees, and which, as he knew well, had been cultivated and was covered with sugar-canes. Where he stood he was not distant above a quarter of a mile from the river, and the field before him ran down to the banks. This was the selected land of Giles Medlicot—two years since a portion of his own run, which had now been purchased from the government—for the loss of which he had received and was entitled to receive no compensation. And the matter was made worse for him by the fact that the interloper had come between him and the river. But he was not standing here near midnight merely to exercise his wrath by straining his eyes through the darkness at his neighbor's crops. He put his finger into his mouth to wet it, and then held it up that he might discover which way the light breath of wind was coming. There was still the low moan to be heard continually through the forest, and yet not a leaf seemed to be moved. After a while he thought he caught a sound, and put his ear down to the ground. He distinctly heard a footstep, and rising up, walked quickly toward the spot whence the noise came.

"Who's that?" he said, as he saw the figure of a man standing on his side of the fence, and leaning against it, with a pipe in his mouth.

"Who are you?" replied the man on the fence. "My name is Medlicot."

"Oh, Mr. Medlicot, is it?"

"Is that Mr. Heathcote? Good-night, Mr. Heathcote. You are going about at a late hour of the night."

"I have to go about early and late; but I ain't later than you."

"I'm close at home," said Medlicot.

"I am, at any rate, on my own run," said Harry.

"You mean to say that I am trespassing?" said the other; "because I can very soon jump back over the fence."

"I didn't mean that at all, Mr. Medlicot; any body is welcome on my run, night or day, who knows how to behave himself."

"I hope I'm included in that list."

"Just so; of course. Considering the state that every thing is in, and all the damage that a fire would do, I rather wish that people would be a little more careful about smoking."

"My canes, Mr. Heathcote, would burn quite as quickly as your grass."

"It is not only the grass. I've a hundred miles of fencing on the run which is as dry as tinder, not to talk of the station and the wool-shed."

"They sha'n't suffer from my neglect, Mr. Heathcote."

"You have men about who mayn't be so careful. The wind, such as it is, is coming right across from your place. If there were light enough, I could show you three or four patches where there has been fire within half a mile of this spot. There was a log burning there for two or three days, not long ago, which was lighted by one of your men."

"That was a fortnight since. There was no heat then, and the men were boiling their kettle. I spoke about it."

"A log like that, Mr. Medlicot, will burn for weeks sometimes. I'll tell you fairly what I'm afraid of. There's a man with you whom I turned out of the shed last shearing, and I think he might put a match down—not by accident."

"You mean Nokes. As far as I know, he's a decent man. You wouldn't have me not employ a man just because you had dismissed him?"

"Certainly not; that is, I shouldn't think of dictating to you about such a thing."

"Well, no, Mr. Heathcote, I suppose not. Nokes has got to earn his bread, though you did dismiss him. I don't know that he's not as honest a man as you or I."

"If so, there's three of us very bad; that's all, Mr. Medlicot. Good-night; and if you'll trouble yourself to look after the ash of your tobacco it might be the saving of me and all I have." So saying, he turned round, and made his way back to the horses.

Medlicot had placed himself on the fence during the interview, and he still kept his seat. Of course he was now thinking of the man who had just left him, whom he declared to himself to be an ignorant, prejudiced, ill-constituted cur. "I believe in his heart he thinks that I'm going to set fire to his run," he said, almost aloud. "And because he grows wool he thinks himself above every body in the colony. He occupies thousands of acres, and employs three or four men. I till about two hundred, and maintain thirty families. But he is such a pig that he can't understand all that; and he thinks that I must be something low because I've bought with my own money a bit of land which never belonged to him, and which he couldn't use." Such was the nature of Giles Medlicot's soliloquy as he sat swinging his legs, and still smoking his pipe, on the fence which divided his sugar-cane from the other young man's run.

And Harry Heathcote uttered his soliloquy also. "I wouldn't swear that he wouldn't do it himself, after all;" meaning that he almost suspected that Medlicot himself would be an incendiary. To him, in his way of thinking, a man who would take advantage of the law to buy a bit of another man's land—or become a free-selector, as the term goes—was a public enemy, and might be presumed capable of any iniquity. It was all very well for the girls—meaning his wife and sister-in-law—to tell him that Medlicot had the manners of a gentleman and had come of decent people. Women were always soft enough to be taken by soft hands, a good-looking face, and a decent coat. This Medlicot went about dressed like a man in the towns, exhibiting, as Harry thought, a contemptible, unmanly finery. Of what use was it to tell him that Medlicot was a gentleman? What Harry knew was that since Medlicot had come he had lost his sheep, that the heads of three or four had been found buried on Medlicot's side of his run, and that if he dismissed "a hand," Medlicot employed him—a proceeding which, in Harry Heathcote's aristocratic and patriarchal views of life, was altogether ungentlemanlike. How were the "hands" to be kept in their place if one employer of labor did not back up another?

He had been warned to be on his guard against fire. The warnings had hardly been implicit, but yet had come in a shape which made him unable to ignore them. Old Bates, whom he trusted implicitly, and who was a man of very few words, had told him to be on his guard. The German, at whose hut he had been in the morning, Karl Bender by name, and a servant of his own, had told him that there would be fire about before long.

"Why should any one want to ruin me?" Harry had asked. "Did I ever wrong a man of a shilling?"

The German had learned to know his young master, had made his way through the crust of his master's character, and was prepared to be faithful at all points—though he too could have quarreled and have avenged himself had it not chanced that he had come to the point of loving instead of hating his employer.

"You like too much to be governor over all," said the German, as he stooped over the fire in his own hut in his anxiety to boil the water for Heathcote's tea.

"Somebody must be governor, or every thing would go to the devil," said Harry.

"Dat's true—only fellows don't like be made feel it," said the German. "Nokes, he was made feel it when you put him over de gate."

But neither would Bates nor the German express absolute suspicion of any man. That Medlicot's "hands" at the sugar-mill were stealing his sheep Harry thought that he knew; but that was comparatively a small affair, and he would not have pressed it, as he was without absolute evidence. And even he had a feeling that it would be unwise to increase the anger felt against himself—at any rate, during the present heats.

Jacko had his pipe still alight when Heathcote returned. "You young monkey," said he, "have you been using matches?"

"Why not, Mr. Harry? Don't the grass burn ready, Mr. Harry? My word!" Then Jacko stooped down, lit another match, and showed Heathcote the burned patch.

"Was it so when we came?" Harry asked, with emotion. Jacko, still kneeling on the ground, and holding the lighted match in his hand, shook his head and tapped his breast, indicating that he had burned the grass. "You dropped the match by accident?"

"My word! no. Did it o' purpose to see. It's all just one as gunpowder, Mr. Harry."

Harry got on his horse without a word, and rode away through the forest, taking a direction different from that by which he had come, and the boy followed him. He was by no means certain that this young fellow might not turn against him; but it had been a part of his theory to make no difference to any man because of such fears. If he could make the men around him respect him, then they would treat him well; but they could never be brought to respect him by flattery. He was very nearly right in his views of men, and would have been right altogether could he have seen accurately what justice demanded for others as well as for himself. As far as the intention went, he was minded to be just to every man.

It seemed, as they were riding, that the heat grew fiercer and fiercer. Though there was still the same moaning sound, there was not a breath of air. They had now got upon a track very well known to Heathcote, which led up from the river to the wool-shed, and so on to the station, and they had turned homeward. When they were near the wool-shed, suddenly there fell a heavy drop or two of rain. Harry stopped and turned his face upward, when, in a moment, the whole heavens above them and the forest around were illumined by a flash of lightning so near them that it made each of them start in his saddle, and made the horses shudder in every limb. Then came the roll of thunder immediately over their heads, and with the thunder rain so thick and fast that Harry's "ten thousand buckets" seemed to be emptied directly over their heads.

"God A'mighty has put out the fires now," said Jacko.

Harry paused for a moment, feeling the rain through to his bones—for he had nothing on over his shirt—and rejoicing in it. "Yes," he said; "we may go to bed for a week, and let the grass grow, and the creeks fill, and the earth cool. Half an hour like this over the whole run, and there won't be a dry stick on it."

As they went on, the horses splashed through the water. It seemed as though a deluge were falling, and that already the ground beneath their feet were becoming a lake.

"We might have too much of this, Jacko."

"My word! yes."

"I don't want to have the Mary flooded again."

"My word! no."

But by the time they reached the wool-shed it was over. From the first drop to the last, there had hardly been a space of twenty minutes. But still there was a noise of waters as the little streams washed hither and thither to their destined courses, and still the horses splashed, and still there was the feeling of an incipient deluge. When they reached the wool-shed, Harry again got off his horse, and Jacko, dismounting also, hitched the two animals to the post and followed his master into the building. Harry struck a wax match, and holding it up, strove to look round the building by the feeble light which it shed. It was a remarkable edifice, built in the shape of a great T, open at the sides, with a sharp-pitched timber roof covered with felt, which came down within four feet of the ground. It was calculated to hold about four hundred sheep at a time, and was divided into pens of various sizes, partitioned off for various purposes. If Harry Heathcote was sure of any thing, he was sure that his wool-shed was the best that had ever been built in this district.

"By Jimini! what's that?" said Jacko.

"Did you hear any thing?"

Jacko pointed with his finger down the centre walk of the shed, and Harry, striking another match as he went, rushed forward. But the match was out as soon as ignited, and gave no glimmer of light. Nevertheless he saw, or thought that he saw, the figure of a man escaping out of the open end of the shed. The place itself was black as midnight, but the space beyond was clear of trees, and the darkness outside being a few shades lighter than within the building, allowed something of the outline of a figure to be visible. And as the man escaped, the sounds of his footsteps were audible enough. Harry called to him, but of course received no answer. Had he pursued him, he would have been obliged to cross sundry rails, which would have so delayed him as to give him no chance of success.

"I knew there was a fellow about," he said; "one of our own men would not have run like that."

Jacko shook his head, but did not speak.

"He has got in here for shelter out of the rain, but he was doing no good about the place."

Jacko again shook his head.

"I wonder who he was?"

Jacko came up and whispered in his ear, "Bill Nokes."

"You couldn't see him."

"Seed the drag of his leg." Now it was well known that the man Nokes had injured some of his muscles, and habitually dragged one foot after another.

"I don't think you could have been sure of him by such a glimpse as that."

"Maybe not," said the boy, "only I'm sure as sure."

Harry Heathcote said not another word, but getting again upon his horse, galloped home. It was past one when he reached the station, but the two girls were waiting up for him, and at once began to condole with him because he was wet. "Wet!" said Harry; "if you could only know how much I prefer things being wet to dry just at present! But give Jacko some supper. I must keep that young fellow in good humor if I can."

So Jacko had half a loaf of bread, and a small pot of jam, and a large jug of cold tea provided for him, in the enjoyment of which luxuries he did not seem to be in the least impeded by the fact that he was wet through to the skin. Harry Heathcote had another nobbler—being only the second in the day—and then went to bed.

CHAPTER III.

MEDLICOT'S MILL.

As Harry said, they might all now lie in bed for a day or two. The rain had set aside for the time the necessity for that urgent watchfulness which kept all hands on the station hard at work during the great heat. There was not, generally, much rest during the year at Gangoil. Lambing in April and May, washing and shearing in September, October, and November, with the fear of fires and the necessary precautions in December and January, did not leave more than sufficient intervals for looking after the water-dams, making and mending fences, procuring stores, and attending to the ailments of the flocks. No man worked harder than the young squatter. But now there had suddenly come a day or two of rest—rest from work which was not of itself productive, but only remedial, and which, therefore, was not begrudged.

But it soon was apparent that the rest could be only for a day or two. The rain had fallen as from ten thousand buckets, but it had fallen only for a space of minutes. On the following morning the thirsty earth had apparently swallowed all the flood. The water in the creek beneath the house stood two feet higher than it had done, and Harry, when he visited the dams round the run, found that they were full to overflowing, and the grasses were already springing, so quick is the all but tropical growth of the country. They might be safe, perhaps, for eight-and-forty hours. Fire would run only when the ground was absolutely dry, and when every twig or leaf was a combustible. But during those eight-and-forty hours there might be comparative ease at Gangoil.

Hosted by Google

On the day following the night of the ride Mrs. Heathcote suggested to her husband that she and Kate should ride over to Medlicot's Mill, as the place was already named, and call on Mrs. Medlicot. "It isn't Christian," she said, "for people living out in the bush as we are to quarrel with their neighbors just because they are neighbors."

"Neighbors!" said Harry; "I don't know any word that there's so much humbug about. The Samaritan was the best neighbor I ever heard of, and he lived a long way off, I take it. Anyway, he wasn't a free-selector."

"Harry, that's profane."

"Every thing I say is wicked. You can go, of course, if you like it. I don't want to quarrel with any body."

"Quarreling is so uncomfortable," said his wife.

"That's a matter of taste. There are people whom I find it very comfortable to quarrel with. I shouldn't at all like not to quarrel with the Brownbies, and I'm not at all sure it mayn't come to be the same with Mr. Giles Medlicot."

"The Brownbies live by sheep-stealing and horse-stealing."

"And Medlicot means to live by employing sheep-stealers and horse-stealers. You can go if you like it. You won't want me to go with you. Will you have the buggy?"

But the ladies said that they would ride. The air was cooler now than it had been, and they would like the exercise. They would take Jacko with them to open the slip-rails, and they would be back by seven for dinner. So they started, taking the track by the wool-shed. The wool-shed was about two miles from the station, and Medlicot's Mill was seven miles farther, on the bank of the river.

Mr. Giles Medlicot, though at Gangoil he was still spoken of as a new-comer, had already been located for nearly two years on the land which he had purchased immediately on his coming to the colony. He had come out direct from England with the intention of growing sugar, and, whether successful or not in making money, had certainly succeeded in growing crops of sugar-canes and in erecting a mill for crushing them. It probably takes more than two years for a man himself to discover whether he can achieve ultimate success in such an enterprise; and Medlicot was certainly not a man likely to talk much to others of his private concerns. The mill had just been built, and he had lived there himself as soon as a water-tight room had been constructed. It was only within the last three months that he had completed a small cottage residence, and had brought his mother to live with him. Hitherto he had hardly made himself popular. He was not either fish or fowl. The squatters regarded him as an interloper, and as a man holding opinions directly averse to their own interests—in which they were right. And the small free-selectors, who lived on the labor of their own hands—or, as was said of many of them, by stealing sheep and cattle—knew well that he was not of their class. But Medlicot had gone his way steadfastly, if not happily, and complained aloud to no one in the midst of his difficulties. He had not, perhaps, found the Paradise which he had expected in Queensland, but he had found that he could grow sugar; and having begun the work, he was determined to go on with it.

Heathcote was his nearest neighbor, and the only man in his own rank of life who lived within twenty miles of him. When he had started his enterprise he had hoped to make this man his friend, not comprehending at first how great a cause for hostility was created by the very purchase of the land. He had been a new-comer from the old country, and, being alone, had desired friendship. He was Harry Heathcote's equal in education, intelligence, and fortune, if not in birth—which surely, in the Australian bush, need not count for much. He had assumed, when first meeting the squatter, that good-fellowship between them, on equal terms, would be acceptable to both; but his overtures had been coldly received. Then he, too, had drawn himself up, had declared that Heathcote was an ignorant ass, and had unconsciously made up his mind to commence hostilities. It was in this spirit that he had taken Nokes into his mill, of whose character, had he inquired about it, he would certainly have heard no good. He had now brought his mother to Medlicot's Mill. She and the Gangoil ladies had met each other on neutral ground, and it was almost necessary that they should either be friends or absolute enemies. Mrs. Heathcote had been aware of this, and had declared that enmity was horrible.

"Upon my word," said Harry, "I sometimes think that friendship is more so. I suppose I'm fitted for bush life, for I want to see no one from year's end to year's end but my own family and my own people." And yet this young patriarch in the wilderness was only twenty-four years old, and had been educated at an English school!

Medlicot's cottage was about a hundred and fifty yards from the mill, looking down upon the Mary, the banks of which at this spot were almost precipitous. The site for the plantation had been chosen because the river afforded the means of carriage down to the sea, and the mill had been so constructed that the sugar hogsheads could be lowered from the buildings into the river boats. Here Mrs. Heathcote and Kate Daly found the old lady sitting at work, all alone, in the veranda. She was a handsome old woman, with gray hair, seventy years of age, with wrinkled face, and a toothless mouth, but with bright eyes, and with no signs of the infirmity of age.

"This is gey kind of you to run so far to see an auld woman," she said.

Mrs. Heathcote declared that they were used to the heat, and that after the rain the air was pleasant.

"You're two bright lassies, and you're hearty," she said. "I'm auld, and just out of Cumberland, and I find it's hot enough—and I'm no guid at horseback at all. I dinna know how I'm to get aboot."

Then Mrs. Heathcote explained that there was an excellent track for a buggy all the way to Gangoil.

"Giles is aye telling me that I'm to gang aboot in a bouggey, but I dinna feel sure of thae bouggeys."

Mrs. Heathcote, of course, praised the country carriages, and the country roads, and the country generally. Tea was brought in, and the old lady was delighted with her guests. Since she had been at the mill, week had followed week, and she had seen no woman's face but that of the uncouth girl who waited upon her. "Did ye ever see rain like that!" she said, putting up her hands. "I thought the Lord was sending his clouds down upon us in a lump like." Then she told them that some of the men had declared that if it went on like that for two hours the Mary would rise and take the cottage away. Giles, however, had declared that to be trash, as the cottage was twenty feet above the ordinary course of the river.

They were just rising to take their leave, when Giles Medlicot himself came in out of the mill. He was a man of good presence, dark, and tall like Heathcote, but stoutly made, with a strongly marked face, given to frowning much when he was eager; bright-eyed, with a broad forehead—certainly a man to be observed as far as his appearance was concerned. He was dressed much as a gentleman dresses in the country at home, and was therefore accounted to be a fop by Harry Heathcote, who was rarely seen abroad in other garb than that which has been described. Harry was an aristocrat, and hated such innovations in the bush as cloth coats and tweed trowsers and neck-handkerchiefs.

Medlicot had been full of wrath against his neighbor all the morning. There had been a tone in Heathcote's voice when he gave his parting warning as to the fire in Medlicot's pipe which the sugar grower had felt to be intentionally insolent. Nothing had been said which could be openly resented, but offense had surely been intended; and then he had remembered that his mother had been already some months at the mill, and that no mark of neighborly courtesy had been shown to her. The Heathcotes had, he thought, chosen to assume themselves to be superior to him and his, and to treat him as though he had been some laboring man who had saved money enough to purchase a bit of land for himself. He was, therefore, astonished to find the two young ladies sitting with his mother on the very day after such an interview as that of the preceding night.

"The leddies from Gangoil, Giles, have been guid enough to ride over and see me," said his mother.

Medlicot, of course, shook hands with them, and expressed his sense of their kindness, but he did it awkwardly. He soon, however, declared his purpose of riding part of the way back with them.

"Mr. Heathcote must have been very wet last night," he said, when they were on horseback, addressing himself to Kate Daly rather than to her sister.

"Indeed he was—wet to the skin. Were you not?"

"I saw him at about eleven, before the rain began. I was close home, and just escaped. He must have been under it all. Does he often go about the run in that way at night?"

"Only when he's afraid of fires," said Kate.

"Is there much to be afraid of? I don't suppose that any body can be so wicked as to wish to burn the grass." Then the ladies took upon themselves to explain. "The fires might be caused from negligence or trifling accidents, or might possibly come from the unaided heat of the sun; or there might be enemies."

"My word! yes; enemies, rather!" said Jacko, who was riding close behind, and who had no idea of being kept out of the conversation merely because he was a sĕrvant. Medlicot, turning round, looked at the lad, and asked who were the enemies.

"Free-selectors," said Jacko.

"I'm a free-selector," said Medlicot.

"Did not jist mean you," said Jacko.

"Jacko, you'd better hold your tongue," said Mrs. Heathcote.

"Hold my tongue! My word! Well, you go on."

Medlicot came as far as the wool-shed, and then said that he would return. He had thoroughly enjoyed his ride. Kate Daly was bright and pretty and winning; and in the bush, when a man has not seen a lady perhaps for months, brightness and prettiness and winning ways have a double charm. To ride with fair women over turf, through a forest, with a woman who may perhaps some day be wooed, can be a matter of indifference only to a very lethargic man. Giles Medlicot was by no means lethargic. He owned to himself that though Heathcote was a pig-headed ass, the ladies were very nice, and he thought that the pig-headed ass in choosing one of them for himself had by no means taken the nicest.

"You'll never find your way back," said Kate, "if you've not been here before."

"I never was here before, and I suppose I must find my way back." Then he was urged to come on and dine at Gangoil, with a promise that Jacko should return with him in the evening. But this he would not do. Heathcote was a pig-headed ass, who possibly regarded him as an incendiary simply because he had bought some land. This boy of Heathcote's, whose services had been offered to him, had not scrupled to tell him to his face that he was to be regarded as an enemy. Much as he liked the company of Kate Daly, he could not go to the house of that stupid, arrogant, pig-headed young squatter. "I'm not such a bad bushman but what I can find my way to the river," he said.

"Find it blindful," said Jacko, who did not relish the idea of going back to Medlicot's Mill as guide to another man. There was a weakness in the idea that such aid could be necessary, which was revolting to Jacko's sense of bush independence.

They were halting on their horses at the entrance to the wool-shed as they discussed the point, when suddenly Harry himself appeared out of the building. He came up and shook hands with Medlicot, with sufficient courtesy, but hardly with cordiality, and then asked his wife as to her ride. "We have been very jolly, haven't we, Kate? Of course it has been hot, but every thing is not so frightfully parched as it was before the rain. As Mr. Medlicot has come back so far with us, we want him to come on and dine."

"Pray do, Mr. Medlicot," said Harry. But again the tone of his voice was not sufficiently hearty to satisfy the man who was invited.

"Thanks, no; I think I'll hardly do that.—Good-night, Mrs. Heathcote; good-night, Miss Daly;" and the two ladies immediately perceived that his voice, which had hitherto been pleasant in their ears, had ceased to be cordial.

"I am very glad he has gone back," said Heathcote.

"Why do you say so, Harry? You are not given to be inhospitable, and why should you grudge me and Kate the rare pleasure of seeing a strange face?"

"I'll tell you why. It's not about him at this moment; but I've been disturbed.—Jacko, go on to the station, and say we're coming. Do you hear me? Go on at once." Then Jacko, somewhat unwillingly, galloped off toward the house. "Get off your horses, and come in here."

He helped the two ladies from their saddles, and they all went into the wool-shed, Harry leading the way. In one of the side pens, immediately under the roof, there was a large heap of leaves, the outside portion of which was at present damp, for the rain had beaten in upon it, but which had been as dry as tinder when collected; and there was a row or ridge of mixed brush-wood and leaves so constructed as to form a line from the grass outside on to the heap. "The fellow who did that was an ass," said Harry; "a greater ass than I should have taken him to be, not to have known that if he could have gotten the grass to burn outside, the wool-shed must have gone without all that preparation. But there isn't much difficulty now in seeing what the fellow has intended."

"Was it for a fire?" asked Kate.

"Of course it was. He wouldn't have been contented with the grass and fences, but wanted to make sure of the shed also. He'd have come to the house and burned us in our beds, only a fellow like that is too much of a coward to run the risk of being seen."

"But, Harry, why didn't he light it when he'd done it?" said Mrs. Heathcote.

"Because the Almighty sent the rain at the very moment," said Harry, striking the top rail of one of the pens with his fist. "I'm not much given to talk about Providence, but this looks like it, does it not?"

"He might have put a match in at the moment?"

"Rain or no rain? Yes, he might. But he was interrupted by more than the rain. I got into the shed myself just at the moment—I and Jacko. It was last night, when the rain was pouring. I heard the man, and dark as was the night, I saw his figure as he fled away."

"You didn't know him?" said Miss Daly.

"But that boy, who has the eyes of a cat, he knew him."

"Jacko?"

"Jacko knew him by his gait. I should have hardly wanted any one to tell me who it was. I could have named the man at once, but for the fear of doing an injustice."

"And who was it?"

"Our friend Medlicot's prime favorite and new factotum, Mr. William Nokes. Mr. William Nokes is the gentleman who intends to burn us all out of house and home, and Mr. Medlicot is the gentleman whose pleasure it is to keep Mr. Nokes in the neighborhood."

The two women stood awe-struck for a moment, but a sense of justice prevailed upon the wife to speak. "That may be all true," she said. "Perhaps it is as you say about that man. But you would not therefore think that Mr. Medlicot knows any thing about it?"

"It would be impossible," said Kate.

"I have not accused him," said Harry; "but he knows that the man was dismissed, and yet keeps him about the place. Of course he is responsible."

CHAPTER IV.

HARRY HEATHCOTE'S APPEAL.

FOR the first mile between the wool-shed and the house Heathcote and the two ladies rode without saying a word. There was something so terrible in the reality of the danger which encompassed them that they hardly felt inclined to discuss it. Harry's dislike to Medlicot was quite a thing apart. That some one had intended to burn down the wool-shed, and had made preparation for doing so, was as apparent to the women as to him. And the man who had been balked by a shower of rain in his first attempt might soon find an opportunity for a second. Harry was well aware that even Jacko's assertion could not be taken as evidence against the man whom he suspected. In all probability no further attempt would be made upon the wool-shed; but a fire on some distant part of the run would be much more injurious to him than the mere burning of a building. The fire that might ruin him would be one which should get ahead before it was seen, and scour across the ground, consuming the grass down to the very roots over thousands of acres, and destroying fencing over many miles. Such fires pass on, leaving the standing trees unscathed, avoiding even the scrub, which is too moist with the sap of life for consumption, but licking up with fearful rapidity every thing that the sun has dried. He could watch the wool-shed and house, but with no possible care could he so watch the whole run as to justify him in feeling security. There need be no preparation of leaves. A match thrown loosely on the ground would do it. And in regard to a match so thrown, it would be impossible to prove a guilty intention.

"Ought we not to have dispersed the heap?" said Mrs. Heathcote at last. The minds of all of them were full of the matter, but these were the first words spoken.

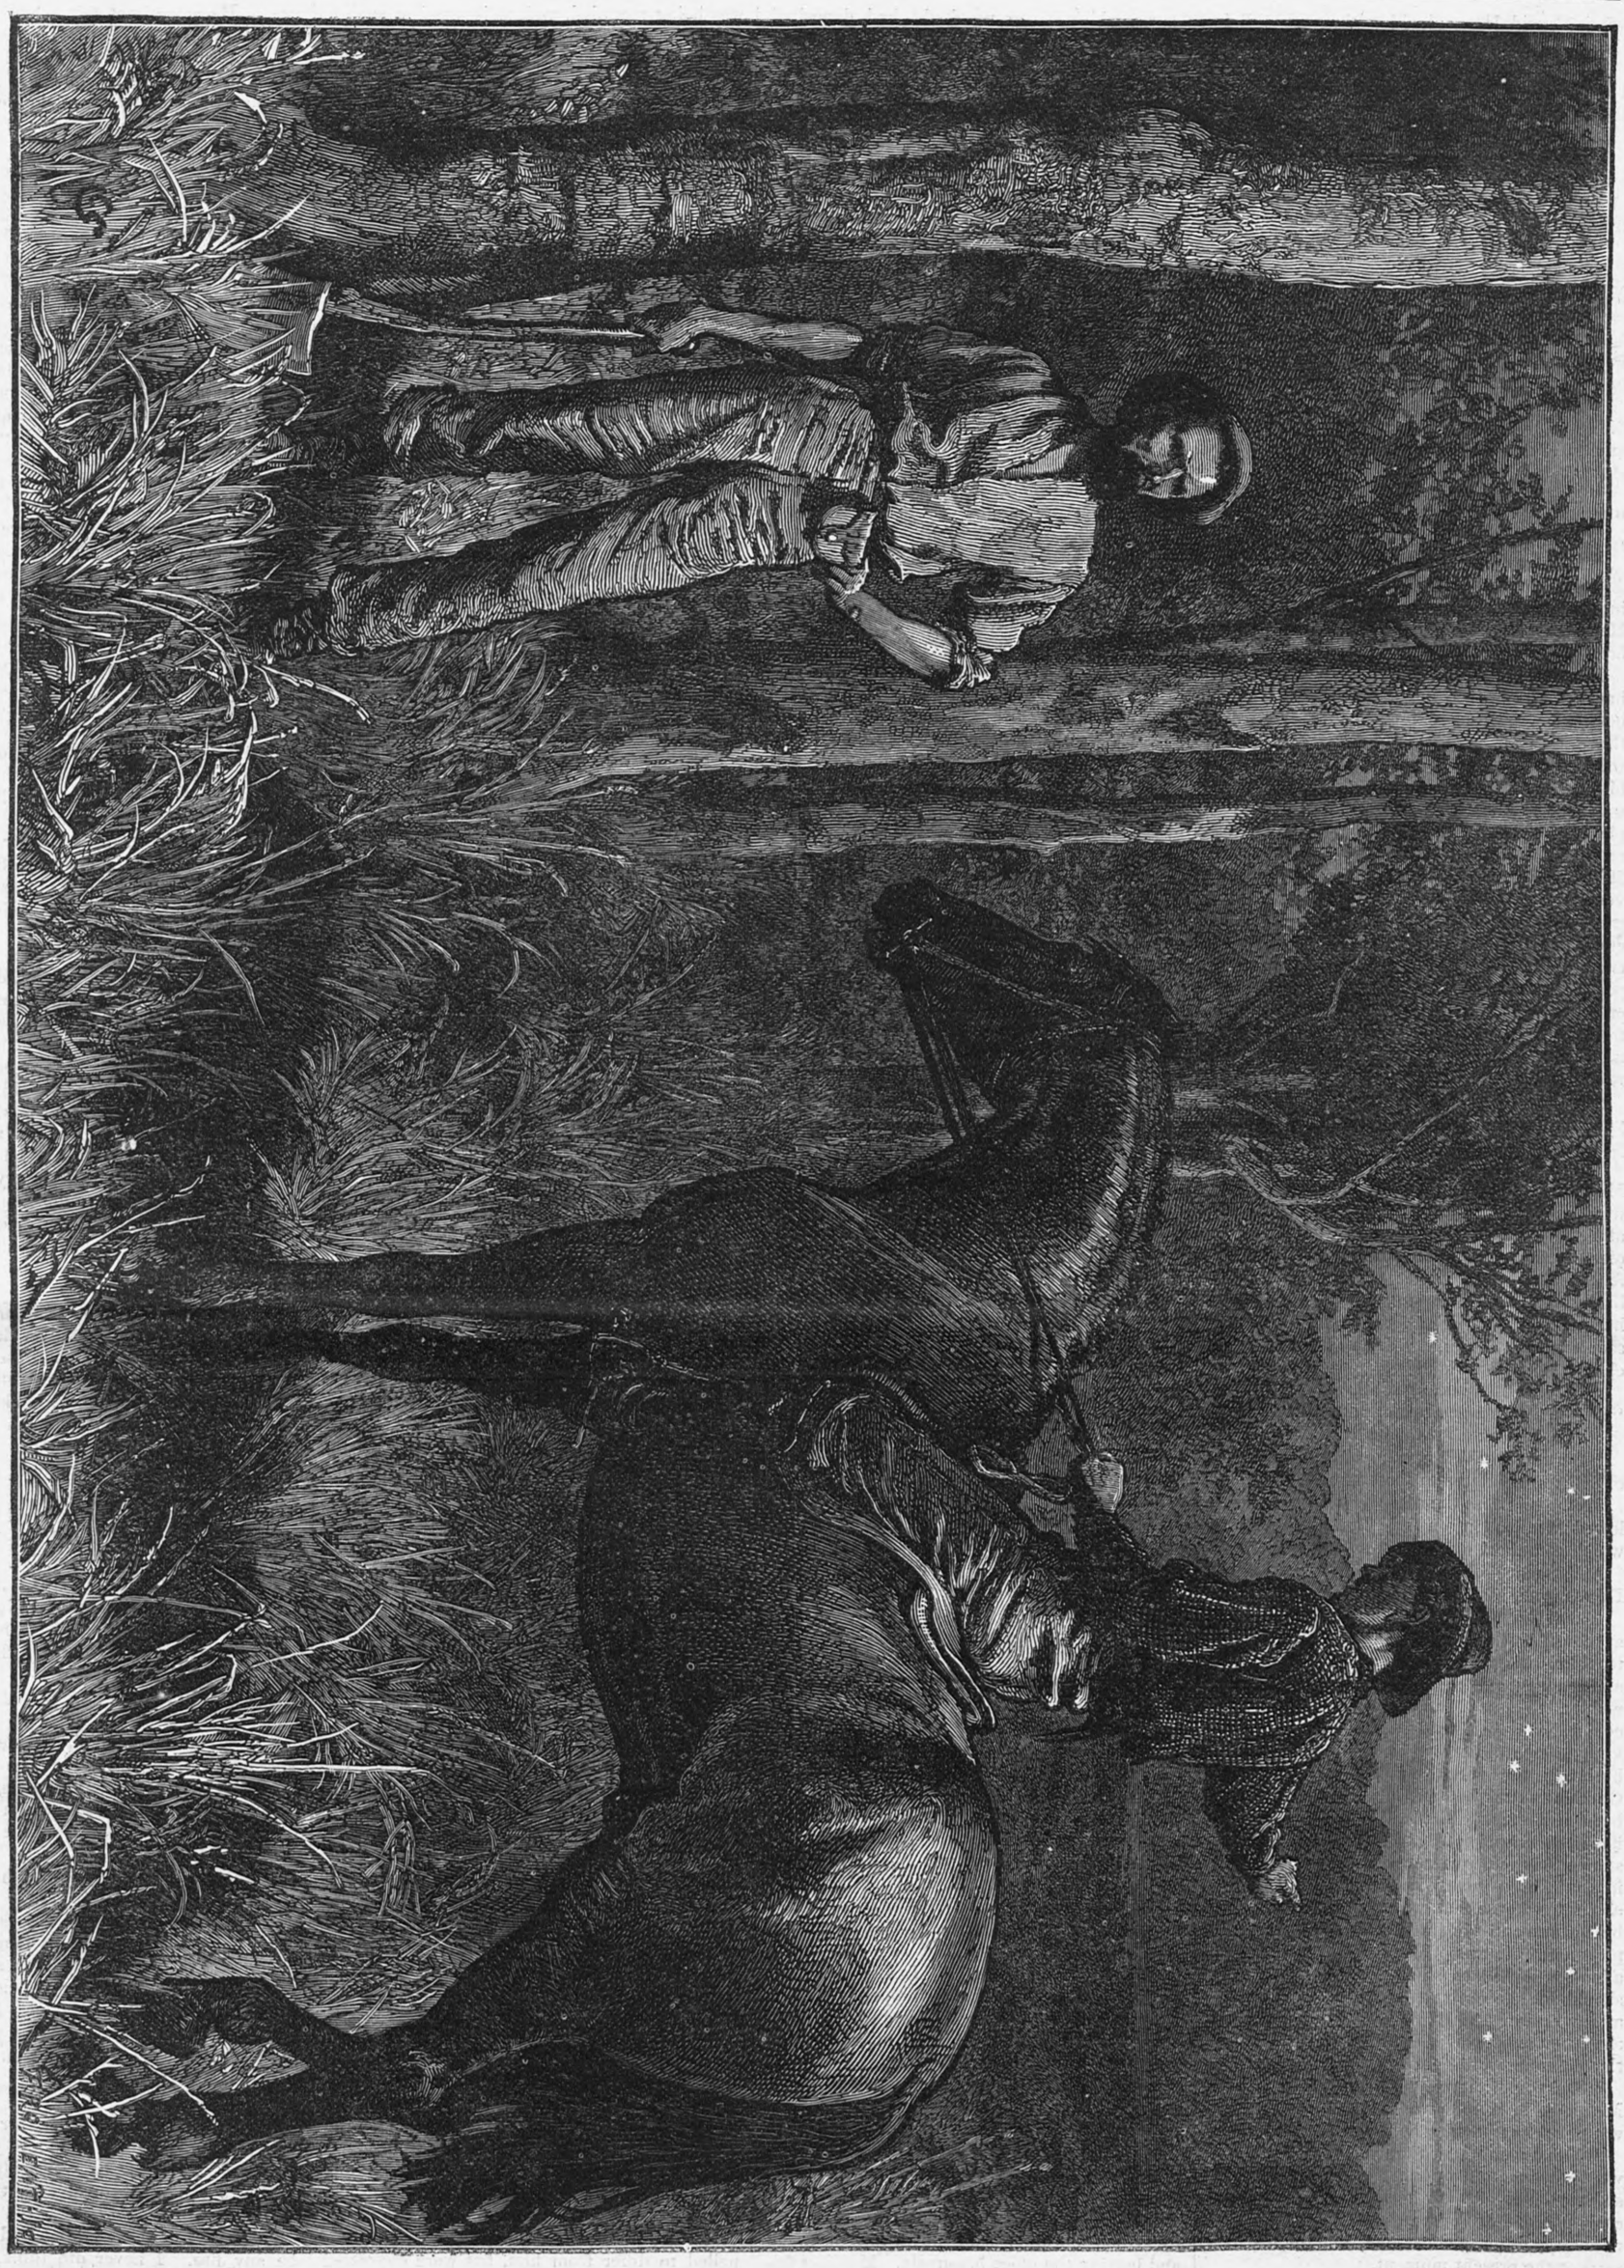
"I'll leave it as it is," said Harry, giving no reason for his decision. He was too full of thought, too heavily laden with anxiety, to speak much. "Come, let's get on; you'll want your dinner, and it's getting dark." So they cantered on, and got off their horses at the gate, without another word. And not another word was spoken on the subject that night. Harry was very silent, walking up and down the veranda with his pipe in his mouth—not lying on the ground in idle enjoyment—and there was no reading. The two sisters looked at him from time to time with wistful, anxious eyes, half afraid to disturb him by speech.

As for him, he felt that the weight was all on his own shoulders. He had worked hard, and was on the way to be rich. I do not know that he thought much about money, but he thought very much of success. And he was by nature anxious, sanguine, and impulsive. There might be before him, within the next week, such desolation as would break his heart. He knew men who had been ruined, and had borne their ruin almost without a wail—who had seemed contented to descend to security and mere absence from want. There was his own superintendent, Old Bates, who, though he grumbled at every thing else, never bewailed his own fate. But he knew of himself that any such blow would nearly kill him—such a blow, that is, as might drive him from Gangoil, and force him to be the servant instead of the master of men. Not to be master of all around him seemed to him to be misery. The merchants at Brisbane who took his wool and supplied him with stores had advanced money when he first bought his run, and he still owed them some thousands of pounds. The injury which a great fire would do him would bring him to such a condition that the merchants would demand to have their money repaid. He understood it all, and knew well that it was after this fashion that many a squatter before him had been ruined.

"Speak a word to me about it," his wife said to him, imploringly, when they were alone together that night.

"My darling, if there were a word to say, I

Hosted by Google



HARRY HEATHCOTE OF GANGOIL.

"Boscobel lowered his axe, and stood for a while contemplating the proposition made to him. 'You are drawing three shillings a night for watching; isn't that so?' 'Yes, that's so. Anyways, I shall draw it.' 'Then why ain't you watching?' 'There's nothing to watch that I knows on—not just now.' 'Then why should I pay you for it? I'm to pay you for ringing these trees, ain't I?' 'Certainly, Mr. Heathcote.' 'Then you're to make double use of your time, and sell it twice over, are you? Don't try to look like a fool, as though you didn't understand. You know that what you're doing isn't honest.'"—CHAPTER V.

would say it. I must be on the watch, and do the best I can. At present the earth is too damp for mischief."

"Oh that it would rain again!"

"There will be heat enough before the summer is over; we need not doubt that. But I will tell you of every thing as we go on. I will endeavor to have the man watched. God bless you! Go to sleep, and try to get it out of your thoughts."

On the following morning he breakfasted early, and mounted his horse without saying a word as to the purport of his journey. This was in accordance with the habit of his life, and would not excite observation; but there was something in his manner which made both the ladies feel that he was intent on some special object. When he intended simply to ride round his fences or to visit the hut of some distant servant, a few minutes signified nothing. He would stand under the veranda and talk, and the women would endeavor to keep him from the saddle. But now there was no loitering, and but little talking. He said a word to Jacko, who brought the horse for him, and then started at a gallop toward the wool-shed.

He did not stop a moment at the shed, not even entering it to see whether the heap of leaves had been displaced during the night, but went on straight to Medlicot's Mill. He rode the nine miles in an hour, and at once entered the building in which the canes were crushed. The first man he met was Nokes, who acted as overseer, having a gang of Polynesian laborers under him—sleek, swarthy fellows from the South Sea Islands, with linen trowsers on and nothing else—who crept silently among the vats and machinery, shifting the sugar as it was made.

"Well, Nokes," said Harry, "how are you getting on? Is Mr. Medlicot here?"

Nokes was a big fellow, with a broad, solid face, which would not have condemned him among physiognomists but for a bad eye, which could not look you in the face. He had been a boundary rider for Heathcote, and on an occasion had been impertinent, refusing to leave the yard behind the house unless something was done which those about the place refused to do for him. During the discussion Harry had come in. The man had been drinking, and was still insolent, and Harry had ejected him violently, thrusting him over a gate. The man had returned the next morning, and had then been sent about his business. He had been employed at Medlicot's Mill, but from the day of his dismissal to this he and Harry had never met each other face to face.

"I'm pretty well, thank ye, Mr. Heathcote. I hope you're the same, and the ladies. The master's about somewhere, I take it.—Picky, go and find the master." Picky was one of the Polynesians, who at once started on his errand.

"Have you been over to Gangoil since you left it?" said Harry, looking the man full in the face.

Hosted by Google

"Not I, Mr. Heathcote. I never go where I've had words. And, to tell you the truth, sugar is better than sheep. I'm very comfortable here, and I never liked your work."

"You haven't been at the wool-shed?"

"What, the Gangoil shed! What the blazes 'd I go there for? It's a matter of ten miles from here."

"Seven, Nokes."

"Seven, is it? It is a longish seven miles, Mr. Heathcote. How could I get that distance? I ain't so good at walking as I was before I was hurt. You should have remembered that, Mr. Heathcote, when you laid hands on me the other day."

"You're not much the worse for what I did; nor yet for the accident, I take it. At any rate, you've not been at Gangoil woolshed?"

"No, I've not," said the man, roughly. "What the mischief should I be doing at your shed at night-time?"

"I said nothing about night-time."

"I'm here all day, ain't I? If you're going to palm off any story against me, Mr. Heathcote, you'll find yourself in the wrong box. What I does I does on the square."

Heathcote was now quite sure that Jacko had been right. He had not doubted much before, but now he did not doubt at all but that the man with whom he was speaking was the wretch who was endeavoring to ruin him. And he felt certain, also, that Jacko was true to him. He knew, too, that he had plainly declared his suspicion to the man himself. But he had resolved upon doing this. He could in no way assist himself in circumventing the man's villainy by keeping his distrust to himself. The man might be frightened, and in spite of all that had passed between him and Medlicot, he still thought it possible that he might induce the sugar grower to co-operate with him in driving Nokes from the neighborhood. He had spent the night in thinking over it all, and this was the resolution to which he had come.

"There's the master," said Nokes. "If you've got any thing to say about any thing, you'd better say it to him."

Harry had never before set his foot upon Medlicot's land since it had been bought away from his own run, and had felt that he would almost demean himself by doing so. He had often looked at the canes from over his own fence, as he had done on the night of the rain; but he had stood always on his own land. Now he was in the sugar-mill, never before having seen such a building. "You've a deal of machinery here, Mr. Medlicot," he said.

"It's a small affair, after all," said the other. "I hope to get a good plant before I've done."

"Can I speak a word with you?"

"Certainly. Will you come into the office, or will you go across to the house?"

Harry said that the office would do, and followed Medlicot into a little box-like inclosure which contained a desk and two stools.

"Not much of an office, is it? What can I do for you, Mr. Heathcote?"

Then Harry began his story, which he told at considerable length. He apologized for troubling his neighbor at all on the subject, and endeavored to explain, somewhat awkwardly, that as Mr. Medlicot was a newcomer, he probably might not understand the kind of treatment to which employers in the bush were occasionally subject from their men. On this matter he said much, which, had he been a better tactician, he might probably have left unspoken. He then went on to the story of his own quarrel with Nokes, who had, in truth, been grossly impudent to the women about the house, but who had been punished by instant and violent dismissal from his employment. It was evidently Harry's idea that a man who had so sinned against his master should be allowed to find no other master—at any rate in that district; an idea with which the other man, who had lately come out from the old country, did not at all sympathize.

"Do you want me to dismiss him?" said Medlicot, in a tone which implied that that would be the last thing he would think of doing.

"You haven't heard me yet." Then Harry went on and told of the fires in the heat of summer, and of their terrible effects—of the easy manner of revenge which they supplied to angry, unscrupulous men, and of his own fears at the present moment.

"I can believe it all," said Medlicot, "and am very sorry that it should be so. But I can not see the justice of punishing a man on the merest, vaguest suspicion. Your only ground for imputing this crime to him is that your own conduct to him may have given him a motive."

Harry had schooled himself vigorously during the ride as to his own demeanor, and had resolved that he would be cool. "I was going on to tell you," he said, "what occurred that night after I saw you up by the fence." Then he described how he and his boy had entered the shed, and had both seen and heard a man as he escaped from it; how the boy had at once declared that the man was Nokes; how the following day he had discovered the leaves, which Nokes no doubt had deposited there just before the rain, intending to burn the place at once; and how Nokes's manner to him within the last half hour had corroborated his suspicions.

"Is he the boy you call Jacko?"

"That's the name he goes by."

"You don't know his real name?"

"I have never heard any other name."

"Nor any thing about him?" Harry owned, in answer to half a dozen such questions, that Jacko had come to Gangoil about six months ago—he did not know whence—had been kept for a week's job, and had then been allowed to remain about the place without any regular wages. "You admit it was quite dark," continued Medlicot.

Harry did not at all like the cross-examination, and his resolution to be cool was quickly fading. "I told you that I saw myself the figure of a man."

"But that you barely saw a figure. You did not form any opinion of your own as to the man's identity."

Harry Heathcote was as honest as the sun. Much as he disliked being cross-examined, he found himself compelled not only to say the exact truth, but the whole truth. "Certainly not. I barely saw a glimpse of a figure, and, till I spoke to Nokes just now, I almost doubted whether the lad could have distinguished him. I am sure he was right now."

"Really, Mr. Heathcote, I can't go along with you. You are accusing a man of committing an offense, which I believe is capital, on the evidence of a boy of whom you know nothing, who may have his own reasons for spiting the man, and whom you yourself did not believe till you had looked this man in the face. I think you allow yourself to be guided too much by your own power of intuition."

"No, I don't," said Harry, who hated his neighbor's methodical argument.

"At any rate, I can't consent to take a man's bread out of his mouth, and to send him away tainted as he would be with this suspicion, either because Jacko thought that he saw him in the dark, or because—"

"I have never asked you to send him away."

"What is it you want, then?"

"I want to have him watched, so that he may feel that if he attempts to destroy my property his guilt will be detected."

"Who is to watch him?"

"He is in your employment."

"He lives in the hut down beyond the gate. Am I to keep a sentry there all night, and every night?"

"I will pay for it."

"No, Mr. Heathcote. I don't pretend to know this country yet, but I'll encourage no such espionage as that. At any rate, it is not English. I dare say the man misbehaved himself in your employment. You say he was drunk. I do not doubt it. But he is not a drunkard, for he never drinks here. A man is not to starve forever because he once got drunk and was impertinent. Nor is he to have a spy at his heels because a boy whom nobody knows chooses to denounce him. I am sorry that you should be in trouble, but I do not know that I can help you."

Harry's passion was now very high, and his resolution to be cool was almost thrown to the winds. Medlicot had said many things which were odious to him. In the first place, there had been a tone of insufferable superiority, so Harry thought, and that, too, when he himself had divested himself of all the superiority which naturally attached to his position, and had frankly appealed to Medlicot as a neighbor. And then this new-fangled sugar grower had told him that he was not English, and had said grand words, and had altogether made himself objectionable. What did this man know of the Australian bush, that he should dare to talk of this or that as being wrong because it was un-English! In England there were police to guard men's property. Here, out in the Australian forests, a man must guard his own, or lose it. But perhaps it was the indifference to the ruin of the women belonging to him that Harry Heathcote felt the strongest. The stranger cared nothing for the utter desolation which one unscrupulous ruffian might produce, felt no horror at the idea of a vast devastating fire, but could be indignant in his mock philanthropy because it was proposed to watch the doings of a scoundrel!

"Good-morning," said Harry, turning round and leaving the office brusquely. Medlicot followed him, but Harry went so quickly that not another word was spoken. To him the idea of a neighbor in the bush refusing such assistance as he had asked was as terrible as to us is the thought of a ship at sea leaving another ship in distress. He unhitched his horse from the fence, and galloped home as fast as the animal would carry him.

Medlicot, when he was left alone, took two or three turns about the mill, as though inspecting the work, but at every turn fixed his eyes for a few moments on Nokes's face. The man was standing under a huge caldron regulating the escape of the boiling juice into the different vats by raising and lowering a trap, and giving directions to the Polynesians as he did so. He was evidently conscious that he was being regarded, and, as is usual in such a condition, manifestly failed in his struggle to appear unconscious. Medlicot acknowledged to himself that the man could not look even him in the face. Was it possible that he had been wrong, and that Heathcote, though he had expressed himself badly, was entitled to some sympathy in his fear of what might be done to him by an enemy? Medlicot also desired to be just, being more rational, more logical, and less impulsive than the other, being also somewhat too conscious of his own superior intelligence. He knew that Heathcote had gone away in great dudgeon, and he almost feared that he had been harsh and unneighborly. After a while he stood opposite Nokes and addressed him.

"Do the squatters suffer much from fires?" he said.

"Heathcote has been talking to you about that," said the man.

"Can't you say Mr. Heathcote when you speak of a gentleman whose bread you have eaten?"

"Mr. Heathcote, if you like it. We ain't particular to a shade out here as you are at home. He has been telling you about fires, has he?"

"Well, he has."

"And talking of me, I suppose?"

"You were talking of having a turn at mining some day. How would it be with you if you were to be off to Gympie?"

"You mean to say I'm to go, Mr. Medlicot?"

"I don't say that at all."

"Look here, Mr. Medlicot. My going or staying won't make any difference to Heathcote. There's a lot of 'em about here hates him that much that he is never to be allowed to rest in peace. I tell you that fairly. It ain't any thing as I shall do. Them's not my ways, Mr. Medlicot. But he has enemies here as 'll never let him rest."

"Who are they?"

"Pretty nigh every body round. He has carried himself that high they won't stand him. Who's Heathcote?"

"Name some who are his enemies."

"There's the Brownbies."

"Oh, the Brownbies. Well, it's a bad thing to have enemies." After that he left the sugar-house and went across to the cottage.

CHAPTER V.

BOSCOBEL.

Two days and two nights passed without fear of fire, and then Harry Heathcote was again on the alert. The earth was parched as though no drop of rain had fallen. The fences were dry as tinder, and the ground was strewed with broken atoms of timber from the trees, each of which a spark would ignite. Two nights Harry slept in his bed, but on the third he was on horseback about the run, watching, thinking, endeavoring to make provision, directing others, and hoping to make it believed that his eyes were every where. In this way an entire week was passed, and now it wanted but four days to Christmas. He would come home to breakfast about seven in the morning, very tired, but never owning that he was tired, and then sleep heavily for an hour or two in a chair. After that he would go out again on the run, would sleep perhaps for another hour after dinner, and then would start for his night's patrol. During this week he saw nothing of Medlicot, and never mentioned his name but once. On that occasion his wife told him that during his absence Medlicot had been at the station.

"What brought him here?" Harry asked, fiercely.

Mrs. Heathcote explained that he had called in a friendly way, and had said that if there were any fear of fire he would be happy himself to lend assistance.

Then the young squatter forgot himself in his wrath. "Confound his hypocrisy!" said Harry, aloud.

"I don't think he's a hypocrite," said the wife.

"I'm sure he's not," said Kate Daly.

Not a word more was spoken, and Harry immediately left the house. The two women did not as usual go to the gate to see him mount his horse, not refraining from doing so in any anger, or as wishing to exhibit displeasure at Harry's violence, but because they were afraid of him. They had found themselves compelled to differ from him, but were oppressed at finding themselves in opposition to him.

The feeling that his wife should in any way take part against him added greatly to Heathcote's trouble. It produced in his mind a terrible feeling of loneliness in his sorrow. He bore a brave outside to all his men, and to any stranger whom in these days he met about the run—to his wife and sister also, and to the old woman at home. He forced upon them all an idea that he was not only autocratic, but self-sufficient also—that he wanted neither help nor sympathy. He never cried out in his pain, being heartily ashamed even of the appeal which he had made to Medlicot. He spoke aloud and laughed with the men, and never acknowledged that his trials were almost too much for him. But he was painfully conscious of his own weakness. He sometimes felt, when alone in the bush, that he would fain get off his horse, and lie upon the ground and weep till he slept. It was not that he trusted no one. He suspected no one with a positive suspicion, except Nokes, and Medlicot as the supporter of Nokes. But he had no one with whom he could converse freely—none whom he had not been accustomed to treat as the mere ministers of his will—except his wife and his wife's sister; and now he was disjoined from them by their sympathy with Medlicot! He had chosen to manage every thing himself without contradiction and almost without counsel; but, like other such imperious masters, he now found that when trouble came the privilege of dictatorship brought with it an almost unsupportable burden.

Old Bates was an excellent man, of whose fidelity the young squatter was quite assured. No one understood foot-rot better than Old Bates, or was less sparing of himself in curing it. He was a second mother to all the lambs, and when shearing came watched with the eyes of Argus to see that the sheep were not wounded by the shearers, or the wool left on their backs. But he had no conversation, none of that imagination which in such a time as this might have assisted in devising safeguards, and but little enthusiasm. Shepherds, so called, Harry kept none upon the run; and would have felt himself insulted had any one suggested that he was so backward in his ways as to employ men of that denomination. He had fenced his run, and dispensed with shepherds and shepherding as old-fashioned and unprofitable. He had two mounted men, whom he called boundary riders, one an Irishman and the other a German—and them he trusted fully, the German altogether, and the Irishman equally as regarded his honesty. But he could not explain to them the thoughts that loaded his brain. He could instigate them to eagerness; but he could not condescend to tell Karl Bender, the German, that if his fences were destroyed, neither his means nor his credit would be sufficient to put them up again, and that if the scanty herbage were burned off any large proportion of his run, he must sell his flocks at a great sacrifice. Nor could he explain to Mickey O'Dowd, the Irishman, that his peace of mind was destroyed by his fear of one man. He had to bear it all alone. And there was heavy on him also the great misery of feeling that every thing might depend on his own exertions, and that yet he did not know how or where to exert himself. When he had ridden about all night and discovered nothing, he might just as well have been in bed. And he was continually riding about all night and discovering nothing.

After leaving the station on the evening of the day on which he had expressed himself to the women so vehemently respecting Medlicot, he met Bates coming home from his day's work. It was then past eight o'clock, and the old man was sitting wearily on his horse, with his head low down between his shoulders, and the reins hardly held within his grasp.

"You're late, Mr. Bates," said Harry; "you take too much out of yourself this hot weather."

"I've got to move slower, Mr. Heathcote, as I grow older. That's about it. And the beast I'm on is not much good." Now Mr. Bates was always complaining of his horse, and yet was allowed to choose any on the run for his own use.

"If you don't like him, why don't you take another?"

"There ain't much difference in 'em, Mr. Heathcote. Better the devil you know than the devil you don't. It's getting uncommon close shaving for them wethers in the new paddock. They're down upon the roots pretty well already."

"There's grass along the bush on the north side."

"They won't go there; it's rank and sour. They won't feed up there as long as they can live lower down and nearer the water. Weather like this, they'd sooner die near the water than travel to fill their bellies. It's about the hottest day we've had, and the nights a'most hotter. Are you going to be out, Mr. Heathcote?"

"I think so."

"What's the good of it, Mr. Heathcote? There is no use in it. Lord love you, what can you do? You can't be every side at once."

"Fire can only travel with the wind, Mr. Bates."

"And there isn't any wind, and so there can't be any fire. I never did think, and I don't think now, there ever was any use in a man fashing himself as you fash yourself. You can't alter things, Mr. Heathcote."

"But that's just what I can do—what a man has to do. If a match were thrown there at your feet, and the grass was aflame, couldn't you alter that by putting your foot on it? If you find a ewe on her back, can't you alter that by putting her on her legs?"

"Yes, I can do that, I suppose."

"What does a man live for except to alter things? When a man clears the forest and sows corn, does he not alter things?"

"That's not your line, Mr. Heathcote," said the cunning old man.

"If I send wool to market, I alter things."

"You'll excuse me, Mr. Heathcote. Of course I'm old, but I just give you my experience."

Hosted by Google

"I'm much obliged to you; though we can't always agree, you know. Good-night. Go in and say a word to my wife, and tell them you saw me all right."

"I'll have a crack with 'em, Mr. Heathcote, before I turn in."

"And tell Mary I sent my love."

"I will, Mr. Heathcote; I will."

He was thinking always of his wife during his solitary rides, and of her fear and deep anxiety. It was for her sake and for the children that he was so care-worn, not for his own. Had he been alone in the world he would not have fretted himself in this fashion because of the malice of any man. But how would it be with her should he be forced to move her from Gangoil? And yet, with all his love, they had parted almost in anger. Surely she would understand the tenderness of the message he had just sent her.

Of a sudden, as he was riding, he stopped his horse and listened attentively. From a great distance there fell upon his accustomed ear a sound which he recognized, though he was aware that the place from whence it came was at least two miles distant. It was the thud of an axe against a tree. He listened still, and was sure that it was so, and turned at once toward the sound, though in doing so he left his course at a right angle. He had been going directly away from the river, with his back to the wool-shed; but now he changed his course, riding in the direction of the spot at which Jacko had nearly fallen in jumping over the fence. As he continued on, the sounds became plainer, till at last, reining in his horse, he could see the form of the woodman, who was still at work ringing the trees. This was a job which the man did by contract, receiving so much an acre for the depopulation of the timber. It was now bright moonlight, almost as clear as day—a very different night, indeed, from that on which the rain had come—and Harry could see at a glance that it was the man called Boscobel still at work. Now there were, as he thought, very good reasons why Boscobel at the present moment should not be so employed. Boscobel was receiving wages for work of another kind.

"Bos," said the squatter, riding up, and addressing the man by the customary abbreviation of his nickname, "I thought you were watching at Brownbie's boundary?" Boscobel lowered his axe, and stood for a while contemplating the proposition made to him. "You are drawing three shillings a night for watching; isn't that so?"

"Yes, that's so. Anyways, I shall draw it."

"Then why ain't you watching?"

"There's nothing to watch that I knows on—not just now."

"Then why should I pay you for it? I'm to pay you for ringing these trees, ain't I?"

"Certainly, Mr. Heathcote."

"Then you're to make double use of your time, and sell it twice over, are you? Don't try to look like a fool, as though you didn't understand. You know that what you're doing isn't honest."

"Nobody ever said as I wasn't honest before."

"I tell you so now. You're robbing me of the time you've sold to me, and for which I'm to pay you."

"There ain't nothing to watch while the wind's as it is now, and that chap ain't any where about to-night."

"What chap?"

"Oh, I know. I'm all right. What's the use of dawdling about up there in the broad moonlight, and the wind like this?"

"That's for me to judge. If you engage to do my work and take my money, you're swindling me when you go about another job as you are now. You needn't scratch your head. You understand it all as well as I do."

"I never was told I swindled before, and I ain't a-going to put up with it. You may ring your own trees, and watch your own fences, and the whole place may be burned for me. I ain't a-going to do another turn in Gangoil. Swindle, indeed!" So Boscobel shouldered his axe, and marched off through the forest, visible in the moonlight till the trees hid him.

There was another enemy made! He had never felt quite sure of this man, but had been glad to have him about the place as being thoroughly efficient in his own business. It was only during the last ten days that he had agreed to pay him for night-watching, leaving the man to do as much additional day-work as he pleased—for which, of course, he would be paid at the regular contract price. There was a double purpose intended in this watching—as was well understood by all the hands employed: first, that of preventing incendiary fire by the mere presence of the watchers; and secondly, that of being at hand to extinguish fire in case of need. Now a man ringing trees five or six miles away from the beat on which he was stationed could not serve either of these purposes. Boscobel therefore had been fraudulently at work for his own dishonest purposes, and knew well that his employment was of that nature. All this was quite clear to Heathcote; and it was clear to him, also, that when he detected fraud he was bound to expose it. Had the man acknowledged his fault and been submissive, there would have been an end of the matter. Heathcote would have said no word about it to any one, and would not have stopped a farthing from the week's unearned wages. That he had to encounter a certain amount of ill usage from the rough men about him, and to forgive it, he could understand; but it could not be his duty, either as a man or a master, to pass over dishonesty without noticing it. No; that he would not do, though Gangoil should burn from end to end. He did not much mind being robbed. He knew that to a certain extent he must endure to be cheated. He would endure it. But he would never teach his men to think that he passed over such matters because he was afraid of them, or that dishonesty on their part was indifferent to him.

But now he had made another enemy—an enemy of a man who had declared to him that he knew the movements of "that chap," meaning Nokes! How hard the world was! It seemed that all around were trouble to him. He turned his horse back, and made again for the spot which was his original destination. As he cantered on among the trees, twisting here and there, and regulating his way by the stars, he asked himself whether it would not be better for him to go home and lay himself down by his wife and sleep, and await the worst that these men could do to him. This idea was so strong upon him that at one spot he made his horse stop till he had thought it all out. No one encouraged him in his work. Every one about the place, friend or foe, Bates, his wife, Medlicot, and this Boscobel, spoke to him as though he were fussy and fidgety in his anxiety. "If fires must come, they will come; and if they are not to come, you are simply losing your labor." This was the upshot of all they said to him. Why should he be wiser than they? If the ruin came, let it come. Old Bates had been ruined, but still had enough to eat and drink, and clothes to wear, and did not work half as hard as his employer. He thought that if he could only find some one person who would sympathize with him and support him, he would not mind. But the mental loneliness of his position almost broke his heart.

Then there came across his mind the dim remembrance of certain old school words, and he touched his horse with his spur and hurried onward: "Let there be no steps backward." A thought as to the manliness of persevering, of the want of manliness in yielding to depression, came to his rescue. Let him, at any rate, have the comfort of thinking that he had done his best according to his lights. After some dim fashion, he did come to recognize it as a fact that nothing could really support him but self-approbation. Though he fell from his horse in utter weariness, he would persevere.

As the night wore on he came to the German's hut, and finding it empty, as he expected, rode on to the outside fence of his run. When he reached this he got off his horse, and taking a key out of his pocket, whistled upon it loudly. A few minutes afterward the German came up to him.

"There's been no one about, I suppose?" he asked.

"Not a one," said the man.

"You've been across on Brownbie's run?"

"Ve're on it now, Mr. 'Eathcote." They were both on the side of the fence away from Gangoil station.

"I don't know how that is, Karl. I think Gangoil goes a quarter of a mile beyond this. But we did not quite strike the boundary when we put up the fence."

"Brownbie's cattle is allays here, Mr. 'Eathcote, and is knocking down the fence every day. Brownbie is a rascal, and 'is cattle as bad as 'isself."

"Never mind that, Karl, now. When we've got through the heats, we'll put a mile or two of better fencing along here. You know Boscobel?"

"In course I know Bos."

"What sort of a fellow is he?" Then Harry told his German dependent exactly what had taken place between him and the other man.

"He's in and in wid all them young Brownbies," said Karl.

"The Brownbies are a bad lot, but I don't think they'd do any thing of this kind," said Harry, whose mind was still dwelling on the dangers of fire.

"They likes muttons, Mr. 'Eathcote."

"I suppose they do take a sheep or two now and then. They wouldn't do worse than that, would they?"

"Not'ing too 'ot for 'em; not'ing too 'eavy," said Karl, smoking his pipe. "The vind, vat there is, comes just here, Mr. 'Eathcote." And the man lifted up his arm, and pointed across in the direction of Brownbie's run.

"And you don't think much of Boscobel?"

Karl Bender shook his head.

"He was always well treated here," said Harry, "and has had plenty of work, and earned large wages. The man will be a fool to quarrel with me."

Karl again shook his head. With Karl Bender, Harry was quite sure of his man, but not on that account need he be quite sure of the correctness of the man's opinion.

Thence he went on till he met his other lieutenant, O'Dowd, and so, having completed his work, he made his way home, reaching the station at sunrise.

"Did Bates tell you he'd met me?" he asked his wife.

"Yes, Harry; kiss me, Harry. I was so glad you sent a word. Promise me, Harry, not to think that I don't agree with you in every thing."

CHAPTER VI.

THE BROWNBIES OF BOOLABONG.

OLD BROWNBIE, as he was usually called, was a squatter also, but a squatter of a class very different from that to which Heathcote belonged. He had begun his life in the colonies a little under a cloud, having been sent out from home after the perpetration of some peccadillo of which the law had disapproved. In colonial phrase, he was a "lag"—having been transported; but this was many years ago, when he was quite young; and he had now been a free man for more than thirty years. It must be owned on his behalf that he had worked hard, had endeavored to rise, and had risen. But there still stuck to him the savor of his old life. Every one knew that he had been a convict; and even had he become a man of high principle—a condition which he certainly never achieved—he could hardly have escaped altogether from the thralldom of his degradation. He had been a butcher, a drover, part owner of stock, and had at last become possessed of a share of a cattle-run, and then of the entire property, such as it was. He had four or five sons, uneducated, ill-conditioned, drunken fellows, who had all their father's faults without his energy, some of whom had been in prison, and all of whom were known as pests to the colony. Their place was called Boolabong, and was a cattle-run, as distinguished from a sheep-run; but it was a poor place, was sometimes altogether unstocked, and was supposed to be not unfrequently used as a receptable for stolen cattle.

The tricks which the Brownbies played with cattle were notorious throughout Queensland and New South Wales, and by a certain class of men were much admired. They would drive a few head of cattle, perhaps forty or fifty, for miles around the country, across one station and another, traveling many hundreds of miles, and here and there, as they passed along, they would sweep into their own herd the bullocks of the victims whose lands they passed. If detected on the spot, they gave up their prey. They were in the right in moving their own cattle, and were not responsible for the erratic tendencies of other animals. If successful, they either sold their stolen beasts to butchers on the road, or got them home to Boolabong. There were dangers, of course, and occasional penalties. But there was much success. It was supposed, also, that though they did not own sheep, they preferred mutton for their daily uses, and that they supplied themselves at a very cheap rate.

It may be imagined how such a family would be hated by the respectable squatters on whom they preyed. Still there were men, old stagers, who had known Moreton Bay before it was a colony—in the old days when convicts were common—who almost regarded the Brownbies as a part of the common order of things, and who were indisposed to persecute them. Men must live; and what were a few sheep? Of some such it might be said, that though they were above the arts by which the Brownbies lived, they were not very scrupulous themselves; and it perhaps served them to have within their ken neighbors whose morality was lower even than their own. But to such a one as Harry Heathcote the Brownbies were utterly abominable. He was for law and justice at any cost. To his thinking, the Colonial Government was grossly at fault, because it did not weed out and extirpate not only the identical Brownbies, but all Brownbieism wherever it might be found. A dishonest workman was a great evil, but, to his thinking, a dishonest man in the position of master was the incarnation of evil. As to difficulties of evidence, and obstacles of that nature, Harry Heathcote knew nothing. The Brownbies were rascals, and should therefore be exterminated.

And the Brownbies knew well the estimation in which their neighbor held them. Harry had made himself altogether disagreeable to them. They were squatters as well as he—or at least so they termed themselves; and though they would not have expected to be admitted to home intimacies, they thought that when they were met out-of-doors or in public places, they should be treated with some respect. On such occasions Harry treated them as though they were dirt beneath his feet. The Brownbies would be found, whenever a little money came among them, at the public billiard-rooms and race-courses within one hundred and fifty miles of Boolabong. At such places Harry Heathcote was never seen. It would have been as easy to seduce the Bishop of Brisbane into a bet as Harry Heathcote. He had never even drank a nobbler with one of the Brownbies. To their thinking, he was a proud, stuck-up, unsocial young cub, whom to rob was a pleasure, and to ruin would be a delight.

The old man at Boolabong was now almost obsolete. Property, that he could keep in his grasp, there was in truth none. He was the tenant of the run under the Crown, and his sons could not turn him out of the house. The cattle, when there were cattle, belonged to them. They were in no respect subject to his orders, and he would have had a bad life among them were it not that they quarreled among themselves, and that in such quarrels he could belong to one party or to the other. The house itself was a wretched place—out of order, with doors and windows and floors shattered, broken, and decayed. There were none of womankind belonging to the family, and in such a house a decent woman-servant would have been out of her place. Sometimes there was one hag there and sometimes another, and sometimes feminine aid less respectable than that of the hags. There had been six sons. One had disappeared utterly, so that nothing was known of him. One had been absolutely expelled by the brethren, and was now a vagabond in the country, turning up now and then at Boolabong and demanding food. Of the whole lot Georgie Brownbie, the vagabond, was the worst. The eldest son was at this time in prison at Brisbane, having on some late occasion been less successful than usual in regard to some acquired bullocks. The three youngest were at home—Jerry, Jack, and Joe. Tom, who was in prison, was the only stanch friend to the father, who consequently at this time was in a more than usually depressed condition.

Christmas-day would fall on a Tuesday, and on the Monday before it Jerry Brownbie, the eldest of those now at home, was sitting, with a pipe in his mouth, on a broken-down stool on the broken-down veranda of the house, and the old man was seated on a stuffy, worn-out sofa with three legs, which was propped against the wall of the house, and had not been moved for years. Old Brownbie was a man of gigantic frame, and had possessed immense personal power—a man, too, of will and energy; but he was now worn out and dropsical, and could not move beyond the confines of the home station. The veranda was attached to a big room which ran nearly the whole length of the house, and which was now used for all purposes. There was an exterior kitchen, in which certain processes were carried on—such as salting stolen mutton and boiling huge masses of meat, when such work was needed. But the cookery was generally done in the big room. And here also two or three of the sons slept on beds made upon stretchers along the wall. They were not probably very particular as to which owned each bed, enjoying a fraternal communism in that respect. At the end of this chamber the old man had a room of his own. Boolabong was certainly a miserable place; and yet, such as it was, it was frequented by many guests. The vagabondism of the colonies is proverbial. Vagabonds are taken in almost every where throughout the bush. But the welcome given to them varies. Sometimes they are made to work before they are fed—to their infinite disgust. But no such cruelty was exercised at Boolabong. Boolabong was a very Paradise for vagabonds. There was always flour and meat to be had, generally tobacco, and sometimes even the luxury of a nobbler. The Brownbies were wise enough to have learned that it was necessary for their very existence that they should have friends in the land. On the Sunday the father and Jerry Brownbie were sitting out in the veranda at about noon, and the other two sons, Jack and Joe, were lying asleep on the beds within.

The heat of the day was intense. There was a wind blowing, but it was that which is called there the hot wind, which comes dry, scorching, sometimes almost intolerable, over the burning central plain of the country. No one can understand without feeling it how much a wind can add to the sufferings inflicted by heat. The old man had on a dirty, wretched remnant of a dressing-gown, but Jerry was clothed simply in trowsers and an old shirt. Only that the mosquitoes would have flayed him, he would have dispensed probably with these. He had been quarreling with his father respecting a certain horse which he had sold, of the price of which the father demanded a share. Jerry had unblushingly declared that he himself had "shaken" the horse—Anglicé, had stolen him—twelve months since on Darnley Downs, and was therefore clearly entitled to the entire plunder. The father had rejoined with animation that unless "half a quid"—or ten shillings—were given him as his contribution to the keep of the animal, he would inform against his son to the squatter on the Darnley Downs, and had shown him that he knew the very run from which the horse had been taken. Then the sons within had interfered from their beds, swearing that their father was the noisiest old "cuss" unhung, they having had their necessary slumbers disturbed.

At this moment the debate was interrupted by the appearance of a man outside the veranda. "Well, Mr. Jerry, how goes it?" asked the stranger.

"What, Bos, is that you? What brings you up to Boolabong? I thought you was ringing trees for that young scut at Gangoil? I'll "Heathcote's in an awful state about them fires, ain't he?" asked Jerry. Boscobel, who had squatted down on the veranda, and was now lighting his pipe, bobbed his head. 'I wish he was clean burned out—over head and ears,' said Jerry. Boscobel bobbed his head again, sucking with great energy at the closely stuffed pipe."—CHAPTER VI.

HARRY HEATHCOTE OF GANGOIL.

be even with him some of these days! He had the impudence to send a man of his up here last week looking for sheep-skins."

"He wasn't that soft, Mr. Jerry, was he? Well, I've dropped working for him.—How are you, Mr. Brownbie? I hope I see you finely, Sir. It's stiffish sort of weather, Mr. Brownbie, ain't it, Sir?"

The old man grunted out some reply, and then asked Boscobel what he wanted.

"I'll just hang about for the day, Mr. Brownbie, and get a little grub. You never begrudged a working-man that yet."

Old Brownbie again grunted, but said no word of welcome. That, however, was to be taken for granted, without much expression of opinion.

"No, Mr. Jerry," continued Boscobel, "I've done with that fellow."

"And so has Nokes done with him."

"Nokes is at work on Medlicot's Mill. That sugar business wouldn't suit me."

"An axe in your hand is what you're fit for, Bos."

"There's a many things I can turn my hand to, Mr. Jerry. You couldn't give a fellow such a thing as a nobbler, Mr. Jerry, could you? I'd offer money for it, only I know it would be taken amiss. It's that hot that a fellow's very in'ards get parched up."

Upon this Jerry slowly rose, and going to a cupboard, brought forth a modicum of spirits, which he called Battle-Axe, but which was supposed to be brandy. This Boscobel swallowed at a gulp, and then washed it down with a little water.

"Come, Jerry," said the old man, somewhat relenting in his wrath, "you might as well give us a drop, as it's going about."

The two brothers, who had now been thoroughly aroused from their sleep, and who had heard the enticing sound of the spirit bottle, joined the party, and so they drank all round.

"Heathcote's in an awful state about them fires, ain't he?" asked Jerry.

Boscobel, who had squatted down on the veranda, and was now lighting his pipe, bobbed his head.

"I wish he was clean burned out—over head and ears," said Jerry.

Boscobel bobbed his head again, sucking with great energy at the closely stuffed pipe.

"If he treated me like he does you fellows," continued Jerry, "he shouldn't have a yard of fencing or a blade of grass left—nor a ewe, nor a lamb, nor a hogget. I do hate fellows who come here and want to be better than any one about 'em—young chaps especially. Sending up here to look for sheep-skins, cuss his impudence! I sent that German fellow of his away with a flea in his ear."

"Karl Bender?"

"It's some such name as that."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Hosted by Google

NOV 30 1920

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

Replaced with Commercial Microform

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
3 9015 03871 5317

DO NOT REMOVE OR MUTILATE CARD

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google